Having described the new altar, Ezekiel is then given instructions for the eight-day purification process that fits the altar for sacred use (43:19–27).

He himself is assigned a key role in this consecration process, just as Moses had instituted the cult given on Mount Sinai. On the first day he is to offer an unblemished bull as a purification offering (haṭṭāʾt), while on days 2–8 he is to offer a male goat as a purification offering and a bull and a ram as burnt offerings. The blood of the purification offerings is to be applied to the altar at the topmost extremities (the four horns), the lowest extremities (all around the rim), and four middle extremities (the four corners of the upper ledge, 43:20).

Zimmerli notes a parallel between this procedure and the ordination of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, in which blood is smeared on the right ear, the thumb of the right hand, and the big toe of the right foot (Lev. 8:22–23). The body of the purification sacrifice is then disposed of by burning it outside the sanctuary. The burnt offerings are also to be offered with salt (Ezek. 43:24). Salt was the preservative par excellence in the ancient Near East and seems to have featured prominently in covenant ceremonies. Although it is elsewhere only specifically required in the regulations for the cereal offering (Lev. 2:13), it may well have formed part of all of the offerings made by fire.

The purpose of this ritual with the repeated presentation of purification offerings is to "purify the altar and make atonement [kipper] for it," so that the holy space can be used for the regular ministry of offering sacrifices (Ezek. 43:20). The concept of making atonement (or expiation) expresses the idea of ritually wiping away the impurities and sins that adhere to a person or object. Israel's past sins have penetrated even to this heavenly sanctuary and must be cleansed before the work of the cult can be restarted. Without a spiritual spring cleaning of the altar, none of the offerings made on it will be acceptable to God. Once Ezekiel has completed his inaugural ministry, assisted by the Zadokite priests (43:19), the priests will be able to carry out their task of offering burnt offerings and fellowship offerings on the altar, the ongoing means of assuring God's blessing on his people. They will once more be acceptable to God (43:27).

Bridging Contexts

PRECONDITIONS FOR THE return of God's glory. The glory of God is an intangible concept for most contemporary Christians. We may pray for God to be glorified in us and in the world, but the idea of glory tends to be somewhat ethereal. In contrast, in the Old Testament the glory of God was a substantial, even tangible, presence. When Moses went up on Mount Sinai, he had an encounter with God's glory that made his face radiant (Ex. 33:18–23; 34:29–30). At the completion of the tabernacle, the glory filled it to such an extent that even Moses could not enter (40:34–35). When Solomon finished constructing his temple and dedicated it, God's response was to descend in glory to fill it (1 Kings 8:11). In Old Testament times, God's glory was the visible manifestation of his presence in the midst of his people. Thus Isaiah's vision of the glory of God filling the temple (Isa. 6) forms the basis for his confident assertion in the following chapter of "God with us" ("Immanuel," Isa. 7:14; 8:8).

But the immanent presence of God with us is not necessarily good news for sinners. That is why Isaiah fell on his face, proclaiming the covenant curse on himself: "Woe to me! . . . I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5). He was afraid that the vision of God's glory would not merely make his face shine but would incinerate him. In Isaiah's case, the solution to his needs was at hand in a fully functional altar, from which the seraph brought a live coal to touch his lips and purify him of his sins (Isa. 6:7).

In Ezekiel's vision, although the fundamental concepts are similar, the situation is more complex. The danger with which he is concerned is not so much the presence of God as the absence of God. Though the wrathful presence of God had already led to the destruction of Jerusalem for her sins, the permanent absence of God is an equally fearful prospect. Without the presence of God at the center of the life of the community, there can be no life. There will simply be a collection of dry bones. Ezekiel's vision of the return of God's glory is the theological prerequisite for the restoration of the people, just as surely as his vision of the departure of God's glory from the Jerusalem temple was a theological prerequisite for its destruction. It is a statement that the Lord is still King—an issue addressed in his victory over the nations in Ezekiel 38–39. Specifically, the Lord is King over Israel and will continue to be their King forever. Never again will they experience total abandonment, the absence of God.

Just as God cannot speak through a prophet with unclean lips, however, but must first cleanse them (Isa. 6:7), so he cannot dwell in an unpurified house. The altar is as necessary in Ezekiel 43 as it was in Isaiah 6. But whereas in Isaiah 6 the prophet saw a fully functional heavenly cult that merely needed to be applied to his condition, in Ezekiel the heavenly cult itself is in abeyance and needs to be reconstituted. In Ezekiel, it is not just the prophet who needs to be cleansed; the heavenly altar itself has been defiled by the sins of the people and needs to be ritually purified before true worship can begin once again.¹⁴

This is a task in which Ezekiel is called to share. Having been faithful in his commission as a watchman in the earlier part of the book, his reward is access to the heavenly altar and a key role in the reinauguration of heavenly worship. It is as if the worship of heaven itself has been halted while God's people are in exile and Jerusalem is in ruins. But now, the vision depicts the resumption of heaven's worship, which carries with it the assurance of a new era in the earthly worship of God's people.

Jesus and God's glory. The testimony of the New Testament is that the new era has dawned in the coming of Jesus Christ. The glories of heaven, depicted in shadowy forms throughout the Old Testament, have now broken into history. Jesus is the fulfillment of the promise of Immanuel; in him, God is with us (Matt. 1:23). In Jesus, the glory of the high and holy God has come and lived in our midst, just as Ezekiel foresaw. As the apostle John testifies, "the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory" (John 1:14). In the language of the writer to the Hebrews, "The Son is the radiance of God's glory and the exact representation of his being (Heb. 1:3). The first of Jesus' miracles, in which he turned water into wine, was not merely an exercise in fulfilling the felt needs of those around him; it was nothing less than a display of his glory (John 2:11).

In general, Christ's glory was veiled even from his closest associates, but on the Mount of Transfiguration the veil was taken away for a moment and the three disciples beheld his radiant presence (Matt. 17:2). On the first Palm Sunday, Jesus entered Jerusalem in kingly triumph—from the east!—and then entered the temple. There he exercised his royal authority over it by throwing out the merchants and the money changers (Matt. 21:1–13).

But in order for his presence with sinful humanity to be for their blessing and not judgment, before his work was complete, Jesus had to offer the perfect sacrifice on the cross. The purpose of this sacrifice was to provide the cleansing blood that might be applied not only to sinners, but also to the heavenly sanctuary itself so that it might be purified (Heb. 9:23). From the perspective of the writer of Hebrews, Jesus is the one who fulfills the prophet's actions in purifying the heavenly altar, only he does his work not with the blood of bulls and goats but with his own blood (9:12). That oncefor-all sacrifice is fully efficacious; it does not merely cleanse the sanctuary so that the endless round of animal sacrifices may begin again; rather, it brings that endless round to a final stop (10:11–12).

This is a sacrifice with power beyond the wildest dreams of the Old Testament prophet. Yet it is a sacrifice that brings about precisely what Ezekiel envisages, for now we may have confidence in God's lasting presence with us forever. Indeed, having sent them out to accomplish the task of proclaiming his lordship over all nations, Jesus' final words to his disciples are these: "Surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:20).

Contemporary Significance

Contemporary understandings of God. The modern world believes increasingly in a God who is not there. Though the opinion polls repeatedly demonstrate that a high proportion of people in the West still "believe in God," the nature of that God has shifted dramatically. In place of the old certainties of a transcendent God, people have come to believe more in an immanent God, a God who is not "there" any more than he (or she) is "here." God is now perceived more as a universal life force than as a personality. The heart of such a creed is expressed in the familiar benediction from the Star Wars films: "May the Force be with you."

One of the consequences of that societal shift is a loss of belief in moral absolutes and a correlative absence of any sense of guilt over personal wrongdoing. If God is not outside me, then there is no basis for a morality outside me. Whereas the "modern" generation sought empowerment to live lives that were "good" according to some objective standard, the "postmodern" generation seeks freedom to follow whatever personal whim drives them. Although the postmodern generation might not find the music to its taste, their attitude is admirably summed up in the lyric from The Sound of Music: "Climb every mountain; ford every stream; follow every byway; 'til you find your dream." The idea that God is absent from us because of our sin and cannot be found by us no matter how diligently we search is alien to our contemporaries.

In contrast to the vague pantheism of so much postmodernism, Christians believe in "the God who is there," in Francis Schaeffer's classic phrase. ¹⁶ A life lived without reference to this God is a life lived without its center. He is the mountain peak for which all climbers are unwittingly looking, the country on the other side that the forders seek, the goal in search of which those wandering the byways travel, the reality behind every dream. This, however, does not mean that "all roads lead to God." Far from it; because of sin, the most accessible and well-traveled roads lead away from God (Matt. 7:14). Left to ourselves, the natural result of all of our searching is futile thinking and darkened hearts. By nature, we continually suppress the truth, exchanging God's glory for diverse idolatries (Rom. 1:21–23).

However, the truth of God's existence does mean that we can proclaim to the restless wanderers of the postmodern generation that there is rest and real freedom to be found only in Christ. God is neither dead nor absent, nor is he silent. He is there and constantly speaking to us, addressing us through the glories of creation and the powerful proclamation of his Word (Ps. 19). As creatures we were made to serve somebody, and we cannot escape that destiny. Whatever we value in this world becomes our idol and master, even the pursuit of freedom and liberty itself. True freedom and true fulfillment come ironically only as we submit ourselves to the One we were made to serve. As John Donne put it:

Take me to you, imprison me, for I, Except you enthrall me, never shall be free, Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.¹⁷

Approaching the God who is there. But if God is objectively there, if his Word is objectively true, and if life may only be found through his presence in our hearts, then the question of how we may approach such a God becomes pressing. Here the need of the postmodern person is the same as the modern, the notorious sinner the same as the righteous-living Pharisee, for "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). All have sinned, and the least sin is sufficient to drive away the life-giving presence of the only true God. How then can we stand in his presence? The only way is to come to the altar. If God is to dwell in our hearts, those hearts must first be cleansed by him. We need the blood of purification applied to our hearts and lives by Jesus Christ, wiping away our sin.

It is that blood that cleanses us of all unrighteousness, making our hearts fit places for God to indwell. It is that blood that is at work in our lives, erecting a wall between us and sin so that sin will not have dominion over us (Rom. 6:14). To be sure, that wall is not yet complete in this life, as we might wish. Sin remains ever with us, our constant unwelcome companion. But the assurance of the new temple is that if Christ has entered our hearts and begun the good work of purification, he will not stop until the wall between us and sin is higher and more effective than that which Ezekiel saw in his new temple.

But when Christ comes into our lives, he does so in only one role: as King. One of the problems that existed in Judah was a confusion over who was really sovereign, a confusion that demonstrated itself in the proliferation of memorial stelae glorifying earthly kings in a building intended to glorify the heavenly King. That may seem an alien problem to us until we start to examine our own hearts and ask how much of our lives are lived to our own glory and how much to God's glory. Who is really sovereign in your decision-making? Who calls the shots in how you spend your money and your time? Who is Lord in how you arrange your priorities? Who occupies the center of your thoughts? All of a sudden, the questions strike closer to home. Although we may confess with our mouths that our bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit, all too often our lives tell a different story.

We can also ask the same question of our churches. Who is really being glorified in what goes on in our worship services? How many of our songs and hymns focus on ourselves, on how good knowing God makes us feel? How many, on the other hand, exalt him for who he is and for what he has done for us in Christ? How often do we emerge from a service more impressed by the skills of the preacher, the musicians, or the soloist than we are overwhelmed by the grace and glory of God? How much of our church's activities are focused on bringing glory to God, compared to how much time, effort, and money are focused on meeting our various needs?

I suspect that we too have our memorial stelae that need to be swept away, if we wish to experience the Spirit of God powerfully at work in our midst. We too have domesticated the church of God, turning it from his kingdom into a little extension of our own kingdoms. But God will live in our midst only as the King, nothing less.

Ezekiel 44

THEN THE MAN brought me back to the outer gate of the sanctuary, the one facing east, and it was shut.

The LORD said to me, "This gate is to remain shut. It must not be opened; no one may enter through it. It is to remain shut because the LORD, the God of Israel, has entered through it. The prince himself is the only one who may sit inside the gateway to eat in the presence of the LORD. He is to enter by way of the portico of the gateway and go out the same way."

⁴Then the man brought me by way of the north gate to the front of the temple. I looked and saw the glory of the LORD filling the temple of the LORD, and I fell facedown.

⁵The LORD said to me, "Son of man, look carefully, listen closely and give attention to everything I tell you concerning all the regulations regarding the temple of the LORD. Give attention to the entrance of the temple and all the exits of the sanctuary. ⁶Say to the rebellious house of Israel, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Enough of your detestable practices, O house of Israel! ⁷In addition to all your other detestable practices, you brought foreigners uncircumcised in heart and flesh into my sanctuary, desecrating my temple while you offered me food, fat and blood, and you broke my covenant. 8Instead of carrying out your duty in regard to my holy things, you put others in charge of my sanctuary. ⁹This is what the Sovereign LORD says: No foreigner uncircumcised in heart and flesh is to enter my sanctuary, not even the foreigners who live among the Israelites.

10% 'The Levites who went far from me when Israel went astray and who wandered from me after their idols must bear the consequences of their sin. ¹¹They may serve in my sanctuary, having charge of the gates of the temple and serving in it; they may slaughter the burnt offerings and sacrifices for the people and stand before the people and serve them. ¹²But because they served them in the presence of their idols and made the house of Israel fall into sin, therefore I have sworn with uplifted hand that they must bear the consequences of their sin, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹³They are not to come near to serve me as priests or come near any of my holy things or my most holy offerings; they must bear the shame of their detestable practices. ¹⁴Yet I will put them in charge of the duties of the temple and all the work that is to be done in it.

15" 'But the priests, who are Levites and descendants of Zadok and who faithfully carried out the duties of my sanctuary when the Israelites went astray from me, are to come near to minister before me; they are to stand before me to offer sacrifices of fat and blood, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁶They alone are to enter my sanctuary; they alone are to come near my table to minister before me and perform my service.

17" 'When they enter the gates of the inner court, they are to wear linen clothes; they must not wear any woolen garment while ministering at the gates of the inner court or inside the temple. ¹⁸They are to wear linen turbans on their heads and linen undergarments around their waists. They must not wear anything that makes them perspire. ¹⁹When they go out into the outer court where the people are, they are to take off the clothes they have been ministering in and are to leave them in the sacred rooms, and put on other clothes, so that they do not consecrate the people by means of their garments.

²⁰" 'They must not shave their heads or let their hair grow long, but they are to keep the hair of their heads trimmed. ²¹No priest is to drink wine when he enters the inner court. ²²They must not marry widows or divorced women; they may marry only virgins of Israelite descent or widows of priests. ²³They are to teach my people the difference between the holy and the common and show them how to distinguish between the unclean and the clean.

²⁴" 'In any dispute, the priests are to serve as judges and decide it according to my ordinances. They are to keep my laws and my decrees for all my appointed feasts, and they are to keep my Sabbaths holy.

²⁵" 'A priest must not defile himself by going near a dead person; however, if the dead person was his father or mother, son or daughter, brother or unmarried sister, then he may defile himself. ²⁶After he is cleansed, he must wait seven days. ²⁷On the day he goes into the inner court of the sanctuary to minister in the sanctuary, he is to offer a sin offering for himself, declares the Sovereign LORD.

²⁸" 'I am to be the only inheritance the priests have. You are to give them no possession in Israel; I will be their possession. ²⁹They will eat the grain offerings, the sin offerings and the guilt offerings; and everything in Israel devoted to the LORD will belong to them. ³⁰The best of all the firstfruits and of all your special gifts will belong to the priests. You are to give them the first portion of your ground meal so that a blessing may rest on your household. ³¹The priests must not eat anything, bird or animal, found dead or torn by wild animals.

Original Meaning

Following on the description of the return of the glory of the Lord to fill the central space of the temple, Ezekiel 44 continues the process of the filling of the various spaces described in chapters 40–42. No one is allowed access to the Most Holy Place itself, but who may be permitted to enter into the inner court of this holy God? The question of access to God is, of course, not a new one in Ezekiel's day. The tabernacle had strict regulations governing access to the different areas, as had Mount Sinai itself before that (Ex. 24). What is new about Ezekiel's vision, however, is that the rules of access are tighter than those of the tabernacle, and the basis for those rules is now bound up in the past obedience of the parties concerned. Those who have proved themselves obedient are rewarded with the closest access to the center, while those who have strayed are allowed only a more limited access. It is the outworking in visionary, graded form of the question and answer of Psalm 24:3–4:

Who may ascend the hill of the LORD?
Who may stand in his holy place?
He who has clean hands and a pure heart, who does not lift up his soul to an idol or swear by what is false.

This section begins with an absolute prohibition of access: the outer east gate is closed and will forever remain closed (Ezek. 44:1–2). Because the Lord entered through it on his return to the Most Holy Place, it has acquired a special sanctity and may not be used by anyone else. However, the space within the gate may be used by the prince for his sacral meals before the Lord. When he does so, he is to enter this space from the outer court, not from outside the temple complex, in order that the outer gate may remain perpetually closed (44:3).

In this way, both the privilege and restriction of the prince's position is emphasized. On the one hand, he holds a unique position among the laity with special privileges, including access to a private room in part of the central east-west spine of the new temple, an especially holy location.⁴ On the other hand, this room is in the outer part of that region, and the prince has no access to the inner court. Thus, compared to the past, when the kings frequently treated the sanctuary as a royal chapel, as if it were their own preserve in which they might establish whatever innovations they wished (e.g., 2 Kings 16:10–18), in future the royal figure has a limited, though still honorable, position.

That the concern of this section is with access—or, to use the language of the passage, "exits and entrances" (Ezek. 43:11)—is further underlined by the brief recapitulation in 44:4–5. Ezekiel sees again the glory of the Lord filling the temple and is thereupon instructed to pay attention to the statutes of the house of the Lord and its laws concerning entrance to the house and its exits. The continued presence of God is contingent on the proper control of access to these areas.

It was a failure to control access in the past that leads to the condemnation of the house of Israel in 44:6. Since Wellhausen used this passage as the heart of his reconstruction of the history of Israelite religion, it has been common to see this passage as a tendentious program aimed at downgrading the Levites from priestly status to that of temple servants.⁵ However, it is important to note that the prime target of accusation is the house of Israel as a whole; they (i.e., the laity) are primarily to blame and are therefore the ones who are "downgraded." The Levites are involved only secondarily and therefore receive only a partial exclusion.⁶

The sin of the past lay in bringing "foreigners uncircumcised in heart and flesh into my sanctuary, desecrating my temple" (44:7). This probably refers to the well-attested practice of employing foreign guards in the temple (2 Kings 11:14–19). The people failed in "carrying out [their] duty in regard to my holy things" (šemartem mišmeret qodāšāy, Ezek. 44:8); instead, they assigned that charge to others. This view is confirmed by the observation that in temple or tabernacle contexts šāmar mišmeret is virtually synonymous with the task of guarding the holy things (Lev. 8:35; 2 Kings 11:5).7 This sin will be repeated no more; uncircumcised foreigners will have no right of access into the sanctuary (Ezek. 44:9).

Unfortunately, the NIV, like most English translations, obscures the flow of thought in the passage by placing a paragraph break after 44:9, as if verse 10 introduces a new subject. In fact, verse 10 continues the thought of what precedes by identifying the legitimate temple guards, the Levites. The flow of the main train of thought is as follows: The foreigners will not enter the sanctuary (v. 9), but the Levites will (v. 10); they will be in my sanctuary serving as armed guards at the gates of the house (v. 11).

To be sure, the Levites are not exonerated from blame; they served the people in the presence of their idols and must bear the consequences of their sin (44:10). Because they are tainted with the corruption of the preexilic sins of the people, they may not enter the inner court, serve as priests, or have any contact with the sacred offerings (44:13). But their ministry is extended rather than restricted when compared with the preexilic situation. Now they must slaughter the burnt offerings and sacrifices on behalf of the people (44:11), something the people had previously done for themselves.⁹

Once again the walls of separation have been raised in Ezekiel's temple in comparison to the preexilic situation. The sin of the Levites, whatever its precise form, has consequences in terms of restriction on access and service. The greater sin of the people has even greater consequences in more strictly regulated access to the sanctuary and its service. The purpose of these regulations is to induce shame in the hearers as they consider their detestable practices (44:13), yet it is a shame mixed with an appreciation of grace, for the sinners have not been excluded utterly from the presence of the holy God, as their sins deserved.

In contrast to the Levites and the people, whose access is restricted because of their sin, the Zadokite priests receive the privilege of sole access to the inner court and the offering of all sacrifices at the altar and the service at the table inside the sanctuary itself (44:15–16). This privilege is explained as being due to their faithful service in the time of Israel's apostasy (44:15). This is not because the narrator in Ezekiel 44 is unaware of the criticisms aimed at the priesthood in 22:26. In fact, it is precisely these sins that he insists will be done away with in the future, when the priests observe God's law and keep his Sabbaths holy (44:24). The righteousness of the Zadokites is relative, not absolute, just as their access is relative: They are permitted to go closer to the inner sanctum than anyone else, but even they are not allowed to enter the Most Holy Place, not even for the annual Day of Atonement ceremony. Just as sin has spatial consequences of restricted access in Ezekiel's vision of the future, so also righteousness brings with it the spatial rewards of greater access.

But greater access into the realm of the holy carries with it also greater responsibilities and limitations. Because the Zadokite priests penetrate closer to the Most Holy Place than any others, they face additional restrictions on their behavior (44:17–27). They must wear linen rather than woolen clothing when they minister so that they do not defile the inner court with their sweat (44:17–18). Sweat may have been undesirable because it was regarded as belonging to the general category of bodily emissions that rendered one unclean (Deut. 23:9–14). Moreover, they are to distinguish between the "sacred" clothes they wear for ministry and the "other [profane] clothes" they wear for the rest of life. The former are to remain within the inner court, housed in the special rooms described in Ezekiel 42:13–14, so that holiness might not be accidentally transmitted to the people (44:19).

In Israelite law, holiness was not dangerous by itself. It was dangerous only to one who was contaminated with impurity or who acted in contravention of its laws.¹⁴ Therefore the priest, who daily handled the holy things, had to take special care with regard to his ritual cleanliness and actions. The fate of Nadab and Abihu stood as a solemn warning of the dangers attending the ministry of serving a holy God (Lev. 10:1–3). Of particular danger was the contamination associated with contact with the realm of death, either through contact with a corpse (Ezek. 44:25) or through the ritual mourning practices of shaving or loosing the hair of the head (44:20).¹⁵ The possibility of potentially fatal errors induced by the consumption of alcoholic beverages is also taken into account (44:21).¹⁶

The need for pure priestly stock, which flows from restricting access to the descendants of the seed of Zadok, is present in the restriction of priestly marriage to unmarried Israelite women or to the widows of priests (44:22). That provision assured that no offspring conceived by a former husband of a different tribe would be accidentally assumed to be of priestly stock.¹⁷ In all these ways, the priests are to be living models of what they teach—that there is a difference between holy and profane, between clean and unclean (44:23).

Since the priests belong to the Lord, they are to have the Lord as their inheritance alone (44:28). Unlike the other tribes, they are to be allotted no territory of their own in the new Promised Land. Instead, they are to be provided for through the sacrificial system. They are to eat the grain offering, the sin and guilt offerings, and all the things vowed to the Lord that cannot be redeemed (as in Lev. 27:28), along with all "the firstfruits" and the "special gifts" (lit., "the sacred contribution from all your sacred contributions," Ezek. 44:30). This last item seems to be related to the "tithe of the tithe," which the Levites are instructed to pass on to the priests in Numbers 18:25–29 (see RSV). This "holy food" from the life-giving altar and the gifts of God's people is to be their sustenance. Birds or animals found dead or torn by wild animals are not to be eaten, however (Ezek. 44:31).

Throughout this chapter, the concern over the holiness of those having access to the central regions of the sanctuary is evident. Those who enter the inner parts of the sanctuary to minister in God's service must have a past history of faithfulness and must continue to walk in the ways of the holy, lest they be destroyed in an instant by the holy God whom they serve.

Bridging Contexts

THE CONCERN FOR and protection of the holy. In ancient Israel, as elsewhere in the ancient Near East, a sanctuary was not a place to be entered lightly and unthinkingly. Rather, the sanctuary was seen as a danger zone, somewhat comparable to a nuclear power plant. In a nuclear power station, strict precautions have to be taken because of the special dangers of radioactivity, which can cause catastrophic effects if it is handled carelessly. Access to some areas of the site is strictly limited, and special clothing has to be worn for some processes to prevent lethal contact between those operating the plant and the radioactive material, and to prevent radioactivity being transmitted by them to the outside world. In an analogous way, the priests had to take special care in their dress and their conduct to avoid danger to themselves and to prevent dangerous levels of holiness being brought into contact with the general public.

Nowhere is this caution more evident than in Ezekiel's vision. This is hardly surprising, given Ezekiel's own experience of seeing the Jerusalem temple defiled and subsequently destroyed by God's holy wrath. Anyone who personally witnessed the carnage caused by the meltdown at the Chernobyl nuclear power station would understandably be concerned to tighten up regulations to guard against its repetition. In precisely the same way, Ezekiel's vision represents a tightening of the "holiness code of practice," a raising of the walls and reinforcing the steel of the containment chamber around the temple. Ezekiel is all too aware of something distant from our contemporary thinking: that it is a fearful thing for sinners to fall into the hands of the all-holy God.

But since we are all sinners, who among us can enter the inner court as a reward for our faithfulness? Who has a "righteousness" great enough to stand in God's presence? As Christians, our natural answer, in terms of the New Testament terminology, is "no one." As Romans 3:23 puts it: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." How then do we explain the "righteousness" of the Zadokites, on the strength of which they are granted access and privileges not granted to others? The answer lies in an understanding of the ancient Near Eastern treaty form known as a "covenant of grant."¹⁸

In this type of treaty, known from Hittite and Akkadian sources as well as in biblical parallels, the faithfulness and loyalty of the ancestor secures the rights of all of his subsequent descendants. Unlike suzerainty treaties, where the covenant acts as a motivation to each generation to show loyalty, a covenant of grant is a simple reward for past loyalty. This loyalty is typically described in the terminology of having walked before the Lord (Gen. 17:1; 24:40; 1 Kings 8:25; 9:4; Isa. 38:3), of having a perfect heart (1 Chron. 28:9; Isa. 38:3), and of having kept God's commands (Gen. 26:5; 1 Kings 2:3). Thus, when the Zadokites are described as having "faithfully carried out the duties of [God's] sanctuary" (Ezek. 44:15), the key issue is their loyalty. They are not implied to be without moral blemish, any more than an Abraham was (Gen. 26:5); however, having been found faithful to God in a day of small things, their reward for loyal service is a place of responsible service in the kingdom (Matt. 25:21).

The question of rewards. The question of reward is a frequent theme in exilic writings, for obvious reasons. The Exile was, from the perspective of the exiles, a world turned upside down. The men in the black hats, the icons of evil, appeared to have won a convincing victory. The temptation to despair and to assimilate, to accommodate oneself to the "new realities," was strong, almost overpowering. How was this to be prevented? How could the exiles be helped to avoid this fate? The answer is by showing them how to don interpretive spectacles that turned reality the right way up and reminded them that ultimately the good would triumph.

This could be done in a number of different ways. For example, the "hero stories" of Daniel, Esther, and Nehemiah show a member of the exiled group triumphing in the midst of the exilic situation, living in the world but not of it, succeeding through wisdom or through the direct intervention of God on their behalf.¹⁹ In a different way, Ezekiel's temple vision turns the world right side up for his hearers, showing them a world in which faithful service of Israel's God receives its due reward.

That reward is, in Ezekiel's vision, a graded reward. Those who have been most faithful (the Zadokites) are rewarded with the greatest access to God; those who have been less faithful (Levites, princes, people) are progressively further at a distance from the throne. This gradation of reward should be neither overstressed nor understressed; there is real differentiation on the basis of merit, yet all the renewed people receive the fundamental blessing of being restored to God's land, with God dwelling in their midst.

Both of these aspects of Ezekiel's teaching are present in the New Testament. (1) In the vision of the new Jerusalem in Revelation 21, the fundamental equality of the saints is stressed. All are made perfect and granted standing in the presence of God himself, the heavenly Most Holy Place, which is the entire city. This is true because of the "covenant of grant" given to all of us who are in Christ; his righteousness is the basis for our full inheritance. In him, through faith, every Christian receives the righteousness of God (Rom. 3:22). In the parable of the workers in the vineyard, those who have worked hardest and longest receive the same reward as those who are hired at the eleventh hour (Matt. 20:1–16).

(2) Yet there are also texts that seem to affirm gradation in reward. In 1 Corinthians 3, Paul draws a contrast between two types of builders. Both are Christians, building up God's church on the only available foundation, Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 3:11); but one builds with gold, silver, and precious stones, while the other builds with wood, hay, and straw (3:12). The works of each will be exposed on the Day of Judgment, its quality tested with fire (3:13). If what a person has built survives, he or she will receive a reward. If it is burned up, he or she will suffer loss (3:14–15). Both are equally saved (3:15), but they receive different rewards.²⁰

Intriguingly, the two Synoptic versions of the parable of the talents present complementary pictures. In Matthew, the focus is on the sameness of the reward that the faithful stewards receive: The man who has been faithful with two talents hears his master say exactly the same words as the one who was faithful with five: "Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Come and share your master's happiness!" (Matt. 25:21, 23). Both have been equally responsible with different amounts and so receive the same reward. In Luke's account, however, the one who faithfully achieved a tenfold increase in the money is rewarded with charge of ten cities, while the servant whose stewardship resulted in a fivefold increase is awarded charge over five cities (Luke 19:17, 19). Starting off with the same amount, their differing fruitfulness receives a graded reward.

There is also a desire throughout the Old Testament for a fully righteous priest who will be able to stand before God on the basis of his faithfulness. In 1 Samuel 2:35, in response to the unfaithfulness of the priests of the day, Hophni and Phinehas, God promised that in the future he would raise up "a faithful priest, who will do according to what is in my heart and mind." Ultimately, both that promise and that desire find their fulfillment in the coming of Jesus, the merciful and faithful high priest of God's appointing (Heb. 2:17). He is the only one who ever has stood, or ever will be able to stand, before God in his own righteousness, to offer to him the prayers and praises of his people. As a result, he is the high priest whom we need to enable us to approach the heavenly throne with boldness (Heb. 4:15–16). Our privileged access comes not from our own righteousness but from his.

Contemporary Significance

ON REWARDS. "What's in it for me?" may seem a crass approach to discerning religious truth. Such an approach smacks too much of health, wealth, and prosperity teachers, who promise an immediate cash payoff for acts of devotion to God. In reaction, Christians have sometimes wanted to discuss the questions of faith "more objectively," as if we should be able to delight in a religion that is true, even though its truth is of no benefit to us personally. An extreme position in this direction was developed by Samuel Hopkins in late eighteenth-century New England, who held that a Christian should be willing to be damned for the glory of God.²¹ The true believer should, so the argument went, desire to serve God even in the absence of any reward.

Scripture is more balanced than either the health-and-wealth extreme or the Samuel Hopkins extreme. Jesus himself asks us to consider carefully the payoff involved in different allegiances when he says, "What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26). He urges us to expend ourselves to store up treasure in heaven (Luke 12:33). Paul stresses repeatedly that our sonship makes us heirs—heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17); it is this future reward that makes our present sufferings of little account (8:18). The world may consider that promise of little account, disdainfully describing it as "pie in the sky when you die," but for Paul it is the basis for a hope that engenders patience in the present (8:25). This hope is not mercenary; it is simply the natural desire of love to possess its object.²² The person who disdains "pie in the sky" is probably a person with no love of pie.

The function of the scriptural teaching of rewards is twofold: It stresses the accountability of the saints to God as well as their future vindication by him.²³ On the one hand, God expects fruitfulness from his servants and will hold everyone accountable for the use of the resources and opportunities entrusted to each one. Much is expected of the one to whom much is given. On the other hand, it is God to whom we are accountable and to whom we are to look for our reward.

This latter aspect of the Bible's teaching is particularly important for those in exile like Ezekiel's readers and for us, who struggle to live in a world where it seems that the immoral thrive while the godly struggle to make ends meet. It speaks to those who, like the psalmist, are tempted to envy the arrogant on account of the prosperity of the wicked (Ps. 73:3). It speaks to all of us who have bought into the ancient lie, presently promoted vigorously from Madison Avenue, that "a man's life . . . consist[s] in the abundance of his possessions" (Luke 12:15).

The answer for Ezekiel, as for the psalmist, comes from a visit to the sanctuary, the place of God's presence with his people. There he is shown that what really counts in life are not the toys of this world but the joys of life in the presence of God. Ezekiel could have echoed the psalmist's words of Psalm 73:25–28:

Whom have I in heaven but you?

And earth has nothing I desire besides you.

My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever.

Those who are far from you will perish; you destroy all who are unfaithful to you. But as for me, it is good to be near God.

I have made the Sovereign LORD my refuge; I will tell of all your deeds.

In biblical terms, the reward that Christians look for and will receive is not a material one. We do not long for bigger and better mansions in heaven,²⁴ still less for Cadillacs and country club homes here on earth. Our heart's desire is rather to approach the presence of Almighty God and to stand before him, to be able to cast down our crowns at his feet and worship, lost in wonder, love, and praise. For us, as for the psalmist, it is simply good to be near God. That is the "pie in the sky" for which we long so passionately, and we could never be content to be eternally without it. As Jonathan Edwards put it:

Love to God . . . will make a man forever unwilling, utterly and finally, to be deprived of that part of his own happiness which he has in God's being blessed and glorified, and the more he loves him, the more unwilling he will be. So that this supposition, that a man can be willing to be perfectly and utterly miserable out of love to God, is inconsistent with itself.²⁵

The way of the cross. There is only one way to enter this reward of eternal life in the close presence of God: the way of the cross. When James and John sought the privilege of sitting at Jesus' right and left hand in glory, the problem was not what they sought but the way in which they sought it. To be close to Jesus is indeed the ultimate reward that heaven offers, but it is not to be had for the asking. Rather, it belongs to those who have drunk the cup of Jesus and shared in his baptism (Mark 10:38). Such privilege is opened up to all Christians through his death in our place. When we are baptized, we are baptized into his death and the fruits that flow from his drinking of the cup in our place (Rom. 6:4). Yet the Scriptures also teach of a special reward reserved for those who have followed closely after the way of the suffering servant in this life (Mark 10:45). We are heirs of his glory in the world to come insofar as we share in his sufferings in the present (Rom. 8:17).

However, the privilege of close access to God is a reward we do not have to wait for eternity to begin to experience. We get to sample the firstfruits of the pie ahead of time. Even now, we can approach the throne of God with boldness, presenting our praises and our petitions, basking in the glory of his love. But if we expect to experience the full blessing of communion with God, our behavior must reflect his holiness. For the Zadokites, access to God's presence meant heavy restrictions on their lifestyle. There were things they could not touch, places they could not go to, food they could not eat, and clothes they could not wear if they were to minister in the presence of the all-holy God. So too for us, if we expect to experience the blessing of God's presence with us, then our lifestyle will be (from the world's perspective) restricted.

People around us will undoubtedly think us strange, "narrow" people because we do not do the things they delight to do (1 Peter 4:4). They will find us odd in our commitment to the truth over convenient lies, to God's Word over more fashionable contemporary perspectives, to morality in an age in which anything goes. But we are not accountable to them and their scale of values. Our scale of values should be centered around the glory of communion with God in the present and eternal life in his presence in the days to come, both of which should motivate us to lives of purity (1 John 3:3). Our world is turned right side up. As John Newton put it:

What words can express the privilege and honor of believers, who, whenever they please, have audience of the King of kings, whose compassion, mercy and power are, like his majesty, infinite. The world wonders at their indifference to the vain pursuits and amusements by which others are engrossed; that they are so patient in trouble, so inflexible in their conduct, so well satisfied with that state of poverty and obscurity which the Lord, for the most part, allots them, but the wonder would cease if what passes in secret were publicly known. They have obtained the pearl of great price; they have communion with God; they derive their wisdom, strength and comfort from on high, and cast all their cares on him who, they assuredly know, vouchsafes to take care of them.²⁶

Ezekiel 45–46

WHEN YOU ALLOT the land as an inheritance, you are to present to the LORD a portion of the land as a sacred district, 25,000 cubits long and 20,000 cubits wide; the entire area will be holy. ²Of this, a section 500 cubits square is to be for the sanctuary, with 50 cubits around it for open land. ³In the sacred district, measure off a section 25,000 cubits long and 10,000 cubits wide. In it will be the sanctuary, the Most Holy Place. ⁴It will be the sacred portion of the land for the priests, who minister in the sanctuary and who draw near to minister before the LORD. It will be a place for their houses as well as a holy place for the sanctuary. ⁵An area 25,000 cubits long and 10,000 cubits wide will belong to the Levites, who serve in the temple, as their possession for towns to live in.

6" You are to give the city as its property an area 5,000 cubits wide and 25,000 cubits long, adjoining the sacred portion; it will belong to the whole house of Israel.

7" 'The prince will have the land bordering each side of the area formed by the sacred district and the property of the city. It will extend westward from the west side and eastward from the east side, running lengthwise from the western to the eastern border parallel to one of the tribal portions. ⁸This land will be his possession in Israel. And my princes will no longer oppress my people but will allow the house of Israel to possess the land according to their tribes.

⁹" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: You have gone far enough, O princes of Israel! Give up your violence and oppression and do what is just and right. Stop dispossessing my people, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁰You are to use accurate scales, an accurate ephah and an accurate bath. ¹¹The ephah and the bath are to be the same size, the bath containing a tenth of a homer and the ephah a tenth of a homer; the homer is to be the standard measure for both. ¹²The shekel is to consist of twenty gerahs. Twenty shekels plus twenty-five shekels plus fifteen shekels equal one mina.

13" 'This is the special gift you are to offer: a sixth of an ephah from each homer of wheat and a sixth of an ephah from each homer of barley. ¹⁴The prescribed portion of oil, measured by the bath, is a tenth of a bath from each cor (which consists of ten baths or one homer, for ten baths are equivalent to a homer). ¹⁵Also one sheep is to be taken from every flock of two hundred from the well-watered pastures of Israel. These will be used for the grain offerings, burnt offerings and fellowship offerings to make atonement for the people, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁶All the people of the land will participate in this special gift for the use of the prince in Israel. ¹⁷It will be the duty of the prince to provide the burnt offerings, grain offerings and drink offerings at the festivals, the New Moons and the Sabbaths at all the appointed feasts of the house of Israel. He will provide the sin offerings, grain offerings, burnt offerings and fellowship offerings to make atonement for the house of Israel.

¹⁸" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: In the first month on the first day you are to take a young bull without defect and purify the sanctuary. ¹⁹The priest is to take some of the blood of the sin offering and put it on the doorposts of the temple, on the four corners of the upper ledge of the altar and on the gateposts of the inner court. ²⁰You are to do the same on the seventh day of the month for anyone who sins unintentionally or through ignorance; so you are to make atonement for the temple.

²¹" 'In the first month on the fourteenth day you are to observe the Passover, a feast lasting seven days, during which you shall eat bread made without yeast. ²²On that day the prince is to provide a bull as a sin offering for himself and for all the people of the land. ²³Every day during the seven days of the Feast he is to provide seven bulls and seven rams without defect as a burnt offering to the LORD, and a male goat for a sin offering. ²⁴He is to provide as a grain offering an ephah for each bull and an ephah for each ram, along with a hin of oil for each ephah.

²⁵" 'During the seven days of the Feast, which begins in the seventh month on the fifteenth day, he is to make the same provision for sin offerings, burnt offerings, grain offerings and oil.

46:1" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: The gate of the inner court facing east is to be shut on the six working days, but on the Sabbath day and on the day of the New Moon it is to be opened. ²The prince is to enter from the outside through the portico of the gateway and stand by the gatepost. The priests are to sacrifice his burnt offering and his fellowship offerings. He is to worship at the threshold of the gateway and then go out, but the gate will not be shut until evening. ³On the Sabbaths and New Moons the people of the land are to worship in the presence of the LORD at the entrance to that gateway. ⁴The burnt offering the prince brings to the LORD on the Sabbath day is to be six male lambs and a ram, all without defect. ⁵The grain offering given with the ram is to be an ephah, and the grain offering with the lambs is to be as much as he pleases, along with a hin of oil for each ephah. 6On the day of the New Moon he is to offer a young bull, six lambs and a ram, all without defect. ⁷He is to provide as a grain offering one ephah with the bull, one ephah with the ram, and with the lambs as much as he wants to give, along with a hin of oil with each ephah. ⁸When the prince enters, he is to go in through the portico of the gateway, and he is to come out the same way.

9" 'When the people of the land come before the LORD at the appointed feasts, whoever enters by the north gate to worship is to go out the south gate; and whoever enters by the south gate is to go out the north gate. No one is to return through the gate by which he entered, but each is to go out the opposite gate. ¹⁰The prince is to be among them, going in when they go in and going out when they go out.

11" 'At the festivals and the appointed feasts, the grain offering is to be an ephah with a bull, an ephah with a ram, and with the lambs as much as one pleases, along with a hin of oil for each ephah.

12When the prince provides a freewill offering to the LORD—whether a burnt offering or fellowship offerings—the gate facing east is to be opened for him. He shall offer his burnt offering or his fellowship offerings as he does on the Sabbath day. Then he shall go out, and after he has gone out, the gate will be shut.

13" 'Every day you are to provide a year-old lamb without defect for a burnt offering to the LORD; morning by morning you shall provide it. ¹⁴You are also to provide with it morning by morning a grain offering, consisting of a sixth of an ephah with a third of a hin of oil to moisten the flour. The presenting of this grain offering to the LORD is a lasting ordinance. ¹⁵So the lamb and the grain offering and the oil shall be provided morning by morning for a regular burnt offering.

16" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: If the prince makes a gift from his inheritance to one of his sons, it will also belong to his descendants; it is to be their property by inheritance. ¹⁷If, however, he makes a gift from his inheritance to one of his servants, the servant may keep it until the year of freedom; then it will revert to the prince. His inheritance belongs to his sons only; it is theirs.

18 The prince must not take any of the inheritance of the people, driving them off their property. He is to give his sons their inheritance out of his own property, so that none of my people will be separated from his property.'"

¹⁹Then the man brought me through the entrance at the side of the gate to the sacred rooms facing north, which belonged to the priests, and showed me a place at the western end. ²⁰He said to me, "This is the place where the priests will cook the guilt offering and the sin offering and bake the grain offering, to avoid bringing them into the outer court and consecrating the people."

²¹He then brought me to the outer court and led me around to its four corners, and I saw in each corner another court. ²²In the four corners of the outer court were enclosed courts, forty cubits long and thirty cubits wide; each of the courts in the four corners was the same size. ²³Around the inside of each of the four courts was a ledge of stone, with places for fire built all around under the ledge. ²⁴He said to me, "These are the kitchens where those who minister at the temple will cook the sacrifices of the people."

In Ezekiel 44:28 the priests were promised no "inheritance" or "possession" in Israel, for the Lord would be their inheritance and possession. Ezekiel 45:1–8 follows up this reference to a new division of the land with a preliminary description of the central area of this land, a sacred strip running from the Mediterranean Sea in the west to the eastern edge of the Promised Land. The division of the land as a whole will be outlined in much greater detail in 47:13–48:35, but the central elements are clear already in chapter 45.

The issue of possession of the land was, of course, a pressing concern to the landless exiles. It had already surfaced as a problem in 33:24–29. The echoes of the theme of Jubilee that we noted at the outset of the vision in chapter 40 would also naturally have raised the question of a redistribution of the land. But the prophet was concerned about more than simply assuring the exiles that there would be an equitable reallocation of the land at some point in the future. Ezekiel wanted to reorient his hearers' focus onto what the original idea of a Promised Land was all about: a land in which God would dwell in their midst.

The primary focus of the division of the land for the prophet here is not safeguarding human equality and land rights, but rather asserting divine sovereignty and safeguarding the divine presence in their midst. Hence, Ezekiel's first concern in introducing the concept of a new division of the land is to insist that the people are to "present to the LORD" as an offering the central portion of the land as a "sacred district" (qōdeš, 45:1). This district is to measure 25,000 cubits by 20,000 cubits, comprising the land assigned to the priests (25,000 cubits by 10,000 cubits) and a similar area assigned to the Levites.²

The primary purpose of this sacred district is to provide a zone of graded holiness outside the temple, exactly analogous to that inside the temple.³ The entire temple complex is, from the perspective of the land, a "Most Holy Place" (45:3). The area immediately around the sanctuary is therefore reserved for the priests, in which they are to build their homes (45:3–4). The strip parallel to the priestly portion and to its north is reserved for the Levites and their cities (45:5), while the half-size strip to its south is for the city (45:6).⁴ To the east and west of the 25,000 cubit sacred square, the remainder of the sacred strip is to be allocated to the prince $(n\bar{a}s\,\hat{i}^{2})$ as his personal (or rather familial) inheritance.

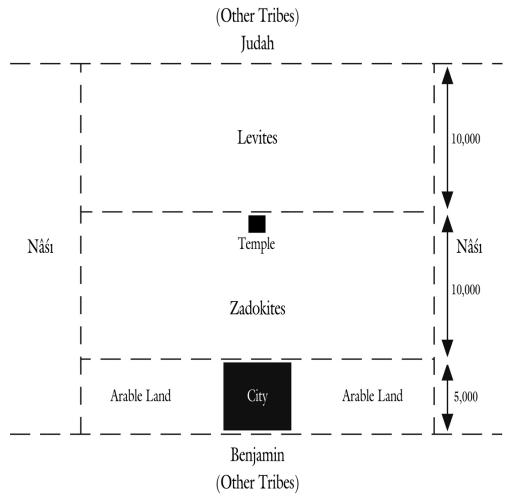

Figure 2. Distribution of Land in the Sacred Portion

The same principles of graded access that applied within the temple complex have thus been extrapolated to the land itself, resulting in an entirely temple-oriented geography. This is evident not simply from the central position of the temple within the land and the restricted access allowed to different groups and individuals, but even from the east-west alignment of the strips into which the land has been divided. In contrast to the rather randomly shaped chunks into which the land was divided in Joshua 12–21, in Ezekiel the entire land is aligned with the east-west orientation of the temple.⁵

Holiness is thus the key principle underlying the division of the land, as is evident from the fact that the word $q\bar{o}de\check{s}$ and its cognates occur no fewer than eleven times in Ezek. 45:1–6. At the center of this Holy Land is the temple, not the city or the king. The old Zion theology, which found its focus in the twin pillars of the election of Jerusalem and David, is now refocused on the central assertion of Yahweh's kingship and rule in the temple.⁶

Even the future kings of the land, now addressed as "my princes," are subject to the Lord's oversight (45:8). Unlike the tribal "leaders" (same Heb. word) in the first division of the land in the days of Joshua (Num. 34:18), these princes in Ezekiel have no active part to play in distributing the land. The divine king has already allocated it, and their responsibility is limited to allowing the house of Israel to possess their tribal land in peace (Ezek. 45:8). Examples of this abuse in Israel's past are too numerous to require documentation; perhaps the classic case is Jezebel's judicial murder of Naboth in order to procure his vineyard for Ahab (1 Kings 21:1–16). Indeed, we may go so far as to say that this is the significant motivation in assigning a substantial portion of the land to the prince and his descendants. The prophet is not concerned so much to keep them in the manner to which they would like to become accustomed but rather to enable them to meet their own needs and to support the ministry of the temple without burdening and oppressing the people.

The primary focus of the prince's duties is temple-centered, as with virtually everything else in Ezekiel 40–48. Thus the prince is responsible to ensure that accurate weights and measures are used in gathering up the offerings and gifts of the people (45:10–12). All are required to participate in the sacred offerings provided by the prince (45:13–16), and it is foreseen that this might be viewed as a possible means for the prince to enrich himself at the cost of the people by using disproportionate measures. Such a possibility is immediately disallowed.

But although the people provide the materials for the regular offerings (45:15–16), it is the prince's responsibility from his own resources to provide the offerings for the special occasions: Sabbaths, New Moons, and annual festivals (45:17). In both the regular and the special offerings, the prince has a central role as the representative of the people in worship, presenting the "sin offerings, grain offerings, burnt offerings and fellowship offerings to make atonement for the house of Israel" (45:17). This is a great privilege, especially given the central significance of purification and atonement in chapters 40–48.8

Mention of the sacrifices on these special occasions in the ritual calendar leads into a discussion of the ritual calendar itself. Like the vision of the temple itself, Ezekiel's calendar appears to be a stripped-down, focused edition of what had previously been in force. There is no mention of the Feast of Weeks, the third annual festival, and the remaining two festivals (Passover and Tabernacles) have become virtually symmetrical festivals of purification, celebrated in the first and seventh months of the year respectively (45:18–25). Of the two, the Feast of Passover retains more of its distinctive features: It is explicitly named "the Passover," and the sevenday feast during which only unleavened bread is to be eaten and the application of sacrificial blood to the doorposts clearly recall the original festival (45:19–21). Yet its original character as a festival of the Lord's deliverance from Egypt is now subordinated to a concern for purifying the sanctuary.

The Passover feast proper is now preceded by a dual ceremony of cleansing the temple on the first and seventh days of the first month (45:18–20). During the seven days of the feast, the prince is to provide seven bulls and seven rams daily as a burnt offering, along with the daily purification offering of a male goat (45:23). This represents a substantial increase from the sacrifices demanded for the Passover in the Mosaic legislation of Numbers 28. The requirement to offer a bull as a purification offering for the prince himself and the entire community before the feast begins is in line with the requirements of Leviticus 4:14, however (Ezek. 45:22).

If the Passover feast is still named and recognizable, the festival in the seventh month, which takes place at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, has lost all its original distinctiveness. It lacks any name or description, except for the fact that the prince is to provide the same offerings for it as at the Passover (45:25). There is apparently no comparable purification ceremony before it, nor is any ceremony recorded that might correspond to the Day of Atonement ceremony associated with this festival in Leviticus 16. The primary annual ritual purification of the central sanctuary now takes place at the beginning of the year. But Ezekiel's special interest in purification remains clear in the prominent place given to the sin offerings in the list of Ezek. 45:25. Both festivals thereby come to share the same interest in atonement for sin, which is the recurrent theme of Ezekiel's cult.¹⁰

The prince is also required to provide the offerings for the Sabbath and New Moon festivals (Ezek. 46:1–8). On the Sabbath, he is to offer six lambs and a ram as a burnt offering, along with the proportionate grain and oil offerings to accompany them (46:4–5), while on the monthly New Moon festival, he is to offer the same plus a young bull (46:6). Of course, he cannot enter the inner court to offer these sacrifices himself; the priests must offer them on his behalf (46:2). However, he has the unique privilege as a layman of approaching to the threshold of the inner east gate and prostrating himself there before the Lord (46:2). "The people of the land," however, are only permitted to approach to the entrance of the gate (46:3). With eight steps leading up to the gateway and beyond it a corridor almost ninety feet long, it is clear that their view of the activities of the inner court is decidedly limited. In Ezekiel's program, the laity are being kept at a "safe" distance from the holy things.

At the annual festivals, God's people are required to present themselves and prostrate themselves before the Lord (46:9). The command for the vassal to present himself at the court of the great king was a common requirement of ancient covenant treaties;¹³ this is therefore an act of corporate submission on the part of the people before the divine king. The community at large is assigned no other tasks in the cult. Even their annual processions through the temple are in the "profane" north-south or south-north direction (46:9), at right angles to the "holy" east-west orientation of priestly ministrations at the altar of burnt offering (43:17).¹⁴ Though the people are clearly expected to offer sacrifices of their own (cf. 46:24), these are relegated to footnote status, barely perceptible in the peripheral vision of the prophet.

The representative nature of the prince as chief worshiper is clear from the fact that he enters in the midst of the people and goes out with them (46:10). But his privileged position is clear also from his access to the east gate of the inner court, which is opened for him whenever he wishes to offer a freewill sacrifice (46:12).

The section on the sacrifices closes with the requirements for the daily sacrifice, which is now limited to a single morning sacrifice of a year-old lamb, with its associated grain offering (Ezek. 46:13–14). The former practice of offering also an evening sacrifice, attested in Numbers 28:4 and 1 Kings 18:29, 36, goes unmentioned.

After his discussion of the sacrifices, Ezekiel returns to his previous topic, the inheritance of the prince (Ezek. 46:16–18; cf. 45:7–8). The prince holds this land leasehold rather than outright, in trust for future generations.

He can therefore only give it permanently to his children; if he should give it as a gift to one of his servants, it will revert to the crown at the year of freedom, the Jubilee year, when all land reverted to its original owners (Lev. 25:13). The purpose of this regulation is straightforward: In an economy where the king typically rewarded loyal service by gifts of land, there would have been a perpetual temptation for the king to acquire ever more land with which to reward his followers. Not so in the new Israel, which will be reconstituted as a nation of free peasants with an inalienable claim to their own land.

The fact that this powerful assertion against land stealing brackets the sacrificial regulations emphasizes the fact that the driving force behind the division of the land is not egalitarianism but divine sovereignty: The land is the Lord's and he divides it. For the prince to intrude on that divinely sanctioned division by amassing greater quantities of land for himself is as impermissible as intruding on the central presence of God in the inner sanctuary or offering improper sacrifices to God. The prince is thereby continually reminded that he is a vassal of the great king and must behave as such.

The entire section of Ezek. 44:1–46:24 is rounded off by a return to the beginning. The heavenly messenger, inactive since 44:4, returns to guide the prophet out of the inner court via the sacred rooms where the priests cook and eat the sacred offerings that are not permitted to leave the sanctity of the inner court (46:19–20). Together they arrive back at the outer court, where the prophet is shown "the kitchens" (L) at its four extremities, where the Levites are to cook the sacrifices of the people (46:21–24). The tour of the temple is thus neatly completed, having gone from the outside to the center (Ezek. 40:5–41:4) and back out again twice.¹⁶

Bridging Contexts

INTERPRETIVE PROBLEMS and their attempted solutions. The middle section of Ezekiel's temple vision has provided almost insoluble problems for a number of different interpretative approaches. The rabbis, convinced in the unbreakable unity of the Old Testament and able at times to resort to considerable ingenuity in their harmonizations, found it virtually impossible to harmonize the regulations of Ezekiel with those of Moses in the Pentateuch. Indeed, it is recorded that one rabbi, Hananiah ben Hezekiah, hid himself away in his attic and burned three hundred barrels of oil in his lamp before being finally able to reconcile the different laws. But for his labors, the book of Ezekiel as a whole was in danger of being excluded from the canon.¹⁷ Unfortunately, the fruits of his efforts were lost to future generations "because of our iniquities." At times, the rabbis gave up altogether and referred their pupils to a higher authority: Elijah would explain it when he came.¹⁹

From an entirely different perspective, the middle portion of Ezekiel's temple vision has proved problematic to dispensationalists. Their difficulty is not in harmonizing Ezekiel and Moses but in harmonizing a "literal" interpretation of Ezekiel's temple as the millennial temple of the restored Jewish nation with the apparently plain New Testament teaching that the levitical sacrifices have been brought to an end with the death of Christ (Heb. 10). Once again, a number of different solutions have been suggested. The majority of dispensationalists have argued that the sacrifices are memorials to the sacrifice of Christ, with no atoning character. However, the idea that these are memorial sacrifices is nowhere apparent in Ezekiel, and it is specifically claimed by Ezekiel that these offerings will make atonement (Ezek. 45:15, 17, 20).²¹

Others have struggled with the identity of "the prince" ($n\bar{a}s\,\hat{i}$ ") in Ezekiel 40–48. Is he a messianic figure, as the "prince" of Ezekiel 34 and 37 appears to be?²² How then do we explain the need to warn the Messiah against sin (45:9; 46:18)? Does the Messiah need to offer a sin offering on his own behalf (45:22), and does he have children (46:16)?²³ But if he is not the Messiah, who is he?

These approaches, it seems to me, have run into difficulty because they have fallen into the classic temptation that besets those of us who take the unity of Scripture seriously. They have given priority to the universal over the particular, asking, "How can I make this text fit with what I know from the rest of Scripture?" rather than, "What distinctive truth does this particular passage teach?" As a result, commentaries on this passage tend to be long on harmonization and short on explanation. Actually, the interpretative problems that so stubbornly resist harmonization are significant keys to understanding the meaning of the passage and of the temple vision as a whole, for which this provides the center.

The nature of a vision and its message here. What the approach of rabbis and dispensationalists alike forget is that Ezekiel 40-48 presents a vision, not legislation. To be sure, part of the vision is in legislative form, but it is vision in the form of legislation, not legislation in the form of vision. Legislation is a law program designed to be carried out; it must therefore either be harmonized with existing legislation or supersede it. Legislation is intended to be interpreted literally as meaning exactly what it says. If God's intent through Ezekiel was to impart new legislation to supplement or supersede the law of Moses, then it was a failure. The returning Jews made no apparent effort to implement the changes proposed, even those that would have required no radical expense or earth-moving equipment, such as the two annual festivals.²⁴ Nor is there any indication within the vision that its implementation is to be postponed to a future millennial temple. Unlike the battle with Gog, which has frequent time indicators fixing it in the distant future, the temple of Ezekiel 40-48 is already extant in visionary form in Ezekiel's own time.25

A vision, however, does not need to be carried out in its details to achieve its purpose. When Martin Luther King Jr. cried out in his famous speech "I have a dream . . ." and went on to outline a vision of black and white children playing together in harmony, his purpose was to encourage repentance, changed hearts, and hope. Provided that emotions were stirred and minds changed to feel sorrow over past attitudes and to envision the possibility of a new future, the dream would have accomplished its purpose, even had repressive laws and practical difficulties prevented the physical realization of the dream. In the same way, Ezekiel's vision was intended to encourage repentance, faithful endurance, and hope of a future unlike the past.

In what ways, then, does Ezekiel 45–46 contribute to this goal of bringing the exiles to repentance, endurance, and hope? (1) The passage (and the vision) asserts that the Lord alone is King. Instead of asking whether "the prince" is a messianic figure, it would be better to ask why the messianic figure of this vision appears in so muted tones, with such limited powers. He is certainly still a figure of great privilege. He owns a substantial portion of real estate bordering on the sacred district; he approaches closer to the Most Holy Place than any other non-Levite; he offers sacrifices on behalf of the whole people; he is the head of a dynasty.

But in power he is still well short of the classic form of the central royal figure of the future golden age.²⁶

Even the identification of the prince as a descendant of David is lacking (unlike chs. 34 and 37), although it is hard to imagine that Ezekiel had a different dynasty in mind. Why is that? Because in Ezekiel's vision there is another central royal figure, the Lord himself reigning in the temple. The past abuses of the monarchy will be done away with, legislated out of existence by a rearrangement of the land and by specific commands to the future monarch; but the monarch himself remains as a representative of the people. He remains in place, but only as the vassal of the Great King, God himself.²⁷

(2) The passage (and the vision) teaches that God is doing a new and greater thing that involves time as well as space. Instead of asking how we can square Ezekiel's sacrificial legislation with that of the Pentateuch, it would be better to ask about the distinctive goal of his program.²⁸ In contrast to the Pentateuchal program, Ezekiel's sacrifices appear to be more numerous and more focused on the concept of purification. This is another way of conveying the same message as the temple building itself, which is larger and more restricted in access than the former temple. God is doing something greater than the former things, a greatness that shows itself in the dimensions of the holy space and the number of the sacrifices.²⁹ God is also doing something that will prevent any repetition of the contamination of the past that drove him from the land, through erecting high walls and buffer zones and inaugurating more rites of purgation.

But the cosmogonic process of creating a new world involves ordering not merely spaces and inhabitants but time itself.³⁰ For that reason, the distinct lack of "timelessness" in the vision is significant. Unlike most eschatological visions in the Bible, which are essentially static tableaux, frozen in time, Ezekiel envisages a place with Sabbaths and New Moons and new years, a place where the year of Jubilee rolls around and the prince has children. In Ezekiel's reordering of the festival calendar, time itself is brought under the discipline of the new age.

(3) The passage once again underlines the message that the temple is at the center of time and space in the new age. It dominates the restored land, which is entirely oriented with reference to it. Social status is entirely determined by access and position relative to it. Providing for its worship services is to be the dominant concern of the prince and people alike. In place of the old centers of Zion and the Davidic king, now everything revolves around the temple. The city and the king are still there, but they no longer have personal names, so that nothing may detract from the glory and prominence of the dwelling of Yahweh in the midst of his people. To put it into a paraphrase of Isaiah's distinctly messianic language, Ezekiel would have said, "For unto us a temple is constructed, to us a sanctuary is given" (cf. Isa. 9:6).

The prince's position, tasks, and responsibilities are all subordinated to the central vision of God's dwelling in the midst of his people in the temple. Thus, since Jesus is the new temple, the glory of God dwelling in the midst of men and women, it is the temple that is the primary "messianic" figure in Ezekiel 40–48. It is the temple that points us to Jesus, not the prince.

The nature of sacrifice and its relation to Jesus. This concern with the presence of God in the midst of his people explains why the sacrifices are central to the temple vision. The entire levitical system of sacrifice served to undergird the covenant relationship of Israel and God. Sacrifice functioned primarily in four different ways in ancient Israel, each reflecting an aspect of the covenant relationship. (1) It provided a means of restoring breaches in the covenant relationship between the vassal and the Great King, through the giving of a substitute as a ransom payment for the sinner. (2) It functioned as a tribute payment from the vassal to his overlord. (3) It provided an opportunity for the vassal king to enjoy a covenant meal with his suzerain. (4) It served as a means of ensuring the necessary cleansing of impurity so that the holy suzerain might dwell with the vassal.³¹ The various sacrifices of the Old Testament each served one or more of these goals.

For the New Testament, however, all of these sacrifices find their fulfillment in Christ. He is the One who atones for us; he is the One who pays our tribute for us; he is the One in whom we experience the blessings of intimate fellowship with the Father; he is the One who cleansed the heavenly temple once and for all on our behalf.

(1) Jesus is our ransom, the atoning sacrifice paid for our redemption. As Mark 10:45 reminds us, Jesus came in order "to give his life as a ransom for many." The apostle Peter tells us, "it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18–19). Jesus, like Isaac, is the beloved Son, to be offered by his own Father (Matt. 3:17)—though for him there is no animal substituted. Jesus himself is "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29). The wages of sin require the death of the covenant-breaker unless a ransom be paid on his or her behalf. Yet unlike the burnt offering, which was offered daily, Jesus offered his sacrifice once and "for all time" on the cross (Heb. 10:12–14). There is no need for a continued repetition of the death of Christ for it was of infinite value.

- (2) In addition, Jesus has offered tribute in our place. He lived the perfect life for us, thus fulfilling all the obligations of the covenant. He humbled himself and became obedient even to the point of death (Phil. 2:8). That is the importance of what theologians call Christ's "active obedience," the fact that his work was not simply to come and die on the cross to pay for our sins, but first of all to come and live the perfect life for us, which is now credited to our account. Without it, his death would not have been sufficient; it would merely have removed our covenant breaking. What God demands of his people, however, is not only no covenant breaking but perfect covenant keeping. Jesus kept the demands of the law fully in our place.
- (3) But as well as being our atonement and our tribute offering, Jesus is also our fellowship offering. In the Lord's Supper, we remember Jesus' death on the cross, where he became the atoning sacrifice for our sins. Yet the meal aspect of the Lord's Supper belongs to the symbolism of the fellowship offering. Unlike Mesopotamian observances, in which the table was laid primarily for the benefit of the deity, the Lord invites his people to sit down to table in his presence and celebrate our deliverance together.³² We feed on the body of Christ, just as in Old Testament times the people actually ate the fellowship offering. The cup we share is called by Jesus "the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:25), recalling the blood of the old covenant, the blood of the burnt offerings and peace offerings sacrificed at Mount Sinai, which was sprinkled on the people (Ex. 24:8). Like the peace offering, the Lord's Supper is a covenant meal, a celebration of the new covenant family of God's goodness and radical self-giving.
- (4) Finally, Jesus is our purification offering. Hence in the book of Hebrews the blood of Jesus is not simply applied to the saints, it is applied to the heavenly sanctuary itself. It is efficacious to purify that heavenly sanctuary once and for all, thus ensuring that God can dwell forever in the midst of his people (Heb. 9:23). Because of this definitive purgation, believers now have confident and direct access to the Most Holy Place itself (10:19)! That purgation no longer needs to be repeated in the shadowy forms of the levitical order because in Christ the fullness of the new order has come!

Contemporary Significance

A PATTERN FOR Christian worship. If the goal of the vision of Ezekiel 45–46 is to bring the exiles to repentance, endurance, and hope through a vision of reordered worship, how may this passage have the same effect on us?

In the first place, it reminds us as well as them that the heavenly order is different from the appearances of the mundane world in which we live. In our worship, we are constructing an alternative outlook on the world, an alternative view of reality, which challenges the worldview of the majority. In our liturgy, we come apart from the everyday world in which we live the rest of the week and envision a different world, a place where we exiles can find a home. Ezekiel's temple provides us a four-dimensional map of that sacred space, inviting us to consider well its spiritual geography, topography, and chronology and to repent and leave behind our earthbound focus.

Moreover, in Ezekiel's vision the Lord is enthroned as King, exalted far above any rivals. In our worship too, there should be no doubt about the sovereignty of God. Our songs, prayers, readings, testimonies, and other varied elements should be theocentric and Christocentric, exalting the triune God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In the world, God the Father may be denigrated, disregarded, and ridiculed; his Son's name may be most often heard taken in vain; his Spirit may be regularly grieved and blasphemed against. But the meetings of his people should all the more be filled with his praises and focused on hearing and doing his will.

In Ezekiel's vision, the prophet clearly anticipates God's doing something new, something greater even than the faith once delivered to Moses. What Ezekiel and the other Old Testament saints looked forward to has now come about in Christ. As the writer to the Hebrews put it: "In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son" (Heb. 1:1–2). This greater privilege that we have gives us reason to worship with greater joy and greater reverence and awe than our spiritual forefathers, who lived ahead of the coming of Christ (12:28).

Specifically, the pattern of the Old Testament sacrifices, as delivered to Moses and writ large by Ezekiel, provides a pattern for Christian worship.

- Over the doorway into worship stands written the need for the forgiveness of sins, and at the heart of worship must be the continual return to God's provided ransom, "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world." This was the focus of the burnt offering.
- In our worship, we should focus our thoughts and give thanks not simply for the passive obedience of Christ—his death on the cross for us—but also for his active obedience—his perfect life lived for us, by which the obligations of the covenant are fulfilled. This was the focus of the grain or tribute offering.
- The goal of our worship—what Christ has achieved for us through his perfect life and atoning death—is nothing less than fellowship with God and with one another around the Lord's Table. This was the focus of the fellowship offering.
- In order for us to worship in the presence of God, both we and the heavenly tabernacle itself must be purified of all unrighteousness. This was the focus of the purification offering and of the self-offering of Jesus, whose blood purifies us from all sin (1 John 1:7).

Contemporary worship. Worship informed by this pattern will be different in a number of ways from much of what passes for worship in the contemporary church. To begin with, it will have a God-centered (and not merely Christ-centered) focus. The goal of Jesus' earthly ministry was to bring glory to the Father's name (John 12:27–28); in return, God the Father would glorify him (13:31–32). Yet so often the Father disappears almost completely from our contemporary worship songs, replaced by an exclusive focus on my relationship with Jesus.

True worship should also preserve the law-gospel dynamic, which lies at the heart of the best historic liturgies. In other words, in order to appreciate the good news of the gospel we need to confront ourselves again with the reality of God's perfect law, which condemns our own sin and points us to Jesus as our sinless substitute. We need to remind ourselves of our personal impurity, which must be cleansed away before we can approach the all-holy God. Without a deep appreciation of our sinfulness and impurity, real worship is not a possibility.

In that worship, all God's people now have a central part to play. Here is where our privilege once again far exceeds that envisaged by Ezekiel. Whereas the ordinary people in his vision were to be kept at a distance from God's presence because of their past sins and a concern to protect his holiness, now, covered in the blood of Christ, we may draw near to the Most Holy Place itself (Heb. 10:19). We need no human priests to interpose between us and the holy God, to conduct our worship on our behalf, for we have a great priest, Jesus, who has perfectly met our needs (10:21).

In the light of that incredible privilege, let us indeed count it a great blessing to draw near to God in worship and adoration. Let us hold unswervingly to the hope we profess, and let us stir one another on to love and good deeds and lives of purified holiness, until the approaching day comes when Christ our King will return and we will be exiles no more (Heb. 10:22–25).

Ezekiel 47:1–12

THE MAN BROUGHT me back to the entrance of the temple, and I saw water coming out from under the threshold of the temple toward the east (for the temple faced east). The water was coming down from under the south side of the temple, south of the altar. ²He then brought me out through the north gate and led me around the outside to the outer gate facing east, and the water was flowing from the south side.

³As the man went eastward with a measuring line in his hand, he measured off a thousand cubits and then led me through water that was ankle-deep. ⁴He measured off another thousand cubits and led me through water that was knee-deep. He measured off another thousand and led me through water that was up to the waist. ⁵He measured off another thousand, but now it was a river that I could not cross, because the water had risen and was deep enough to swim in—a river that no one could cross. ⁶He asked me, "Son of man, do you see this?"

Then he led me back to the bank of the river.

Then I arrived there, I saw a great number of trees on each side of the river.

He said to me, "This water flows toward the eastern region and goes down into the Arabah, where it enters the Sea. When it empties into the Sea, the water there becomes fresh.

Swarms of living creatures will live wherever the river flows. There will be large numbers of fish, because this water flows there and makes the salt water fresh; so where the river flows everything will live.

The Fishermen will stand along the shore; from En Gedi to En Eglaim there will be places for spreading nets. The fish will be of many kinds—like the fish of the Great Sea. ¹¹But the swamps and marshes will not become fresh; they will be left for salt. ¹²Fruit trees of all kinds will grow on both banks of the river. Their leaves will not wither, nor will their fruit fail. Every month they will bear, because the water from the sanctuary flows to them. Their fruit will serve for food and their leaves for healing."

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL'S TOUR OF the temple is now complete. His vision at this point turns outward to the rest of the land and the influence that the thorough restoration of the temple as the place of God's dwelling will have on it. That influence is nothing short of a total transformation from death to life, a transformation expressed in the visionary form of a life-giving river that flows out from the temple.

The source of the living water is the temple itself, or, more precisely, the south side of the temple, south of the altar (Ezek. 47:1). This was the site of the "Sea" in Solomon's temple, a massive bronze pool whose practical purpose was to provide the water required for cleansing (1 Kings 7:23, 39). Its significance was more than merely practical, however. By calling it "the Sea" (hayyām), a rather grandiose title for an object smaller than most above-ground swimming pools today (fifteen feet in diameter), it also appears to have had a symbolic significance, representing the forces of chaos subjugated in the orderly cosmos of the temple. In ancient Near Eastern mythology, the sea (hayyām) was one of the chief enemies of the gods, whose defeat was necessary before the cosmic order could be established. This same imagery is present in the Psalms, especially in the enthronement psalms, where the sea's chaos is subjugated by the Lord (Ps. 46:2–3; 93:3–4; 95:5; 96:11; 98:7).

In Ezekiel's vision, the static categories of the old symbolism have been transformed into dynamic motion. The "Sea" now becomes the source of a life-giving river that flows out from the temple, another idea with extensive roots in the Bible. Thus in Psalm 46, in response to the imagined chaos of the earth giving way and the mountains falling "into the heart of the sea"

(!), the psalmist draws strength from the idyllic picture of the river whose streams make glad the city of God, the holy place where the Most High dwells (46:2–4). The archetype of this river is the earth-fructifying stream that flows out in four branches from the prototypical sanctuary of Eden (Gen. 2:10–14).⁵

The river flowing from Ezekiel's temple follows the sacred route eastward from the inner court, out through the (closed!) east gate of the outer court (Ezek. 47:2). Because Ezekiel cannot follow it through there, he is brought round by the north gate and sees it trickling out of the south side of the gate. In comparison with the abundant streams of the traditional picture, the renewed temple provides at first a minimal flow. Yet the stream that starts out so pitifully small miraculously becomes progressively larger the further he journeys along it. At first, it is a trickle; after a thousand cubits (1,500 feet), it is ankle-deep (47:3); after another thousand cubits, it is knee-deep (47:4), then waist-deep (47:4), and finally an uncrossable torrent (47:5). The guiding angel asks him to pause here and ponder its significance: "Son of man, do you see this?" (47:6).

The miraculous growth of this river from small beginnings is not the only lesson to be observed, however. This river is also a transforming force wherever it flows. It brings fertility to the ground surrounding it, indicated by the presence of a great many trees on both sides of the river (47:7). After flowing eastward and then south through the Arabah, which here seems to indicate simply the region of the Jordan Valley, the river transforms the Dead Sea, healing its waters—that is, turning its salty water, which is undrinkable and hostile to life, into drinkable, life-supporting water (47:8). This Edenic river will induce Paradise-like levels of fertility, teeming with all kinds of swarming creatures (47:9), like the waters of Genesis 1:20, and a great many fish "of many kinds" (Ezek. 47:10 cf. Gen. 1:21). To sum up the pictorial message in straightforward speech: "Where the river flows everything will live" (Ezek. 47:9).

Nor is this abundant fertility merely fertility in the abstract. It is explicitly fertility as a blessing to the restored people of Israel. The abundant fish will support an equally abundant number of fishermen, from En Gedi to En Eglaim. These are two locations span the shores of the Dead Sea; thus, "from En Gedi to En Eglaim" encompasses the scope of the whole Dead Sea.⁷ But even while the waters of the Dead Sea will be healed, its one existing use, as the source of valuable salt deposits, will not be eliminated (47:11).

The numerous trees of Ezek. 47:7 are now more closely defined as "fruit trees" (lit., "food trees," 47:12). They will not suffer from any lack of moisture; rather, as with the depiction of the righteous person in Psalm 1, "their leaves will not wither, nor will their fruit fail." Indeed, they will be so full of life that they will bear new fruit every month to feed the population, and their leaves will be for healing (Ezek. 47:12). All of this will be brought about because they are fed from the source of life-giving fruitfulness, the stream that flows from the temple.

Bridging Contexts

DISTINCTIVENESS IN EZEKIEL'S use of the river. The image of a life-giving stream flowing from the sanctuary is ubiquitous in the Scriptures, from the opening chapters of Genesis (Gen. 2:10–14) to the closing chapter of Revelation. Revelation 22 features a river similar in many respects to that of Ezekiel 47, which flows from the throne of God and the Lamb out to nourish the (single) tree of life, whose fruit appears every month and whose leaves are "for the healing of the nations" (Rev. 22:1–2). The motif is also attested in mythological literature from the ancient Near East. Yet because of the frequent use of this motif, it would be easy to overlook what is distinctive about Ezekiel's use.

- (1) The most striking aspect of Ezekiel's river is that, unlike the other rivers of life, it starts out as an insignificant trickle and only ends up as a thunderous torrent after a distance. This is something that no upheaval in the topography of Palestine can accomplish literally. What is more, it is precisely this growth from insignificant beginnings that the prophet is instructed to observe. In the language of his later colleague, the lesson is that he should not despise the day of small things (Zech. 4:10). Though the work of God starts out in tiny, seemingly insignificant ways, it will ultimately accomplish God's goals with unstoppable power. In a similar way the tiny mustard seed, to which Jesus likened the kingdom of God, grows to become a mighty tree (Matt. 13:31).
- (2) Another aspect that Ezekiel's river gives prominence to is the theme of transformation. The other rivers of life are eternal, fertility-inducing streams. They bring life to everything they touch, but there is no reflection on any prior state of the land that they impact. In contrast, Ezekiel's river brings not merely life but life-from-the-dead. It not only provides fresh, living water, but "heals" the dead, salt-contaminated water of the Dead Sea.

The motif of "healing the water" brings with it echoes of Israel's earlier history. At Marah, Israel's first stop in the desert after crossing over the Reed Sea, the water was so bitter that Israel could not drink it. In spite of the people's grumbling, the Lord graciously gave Moses the answer to their need: a piece of wood that, when thrown into the water, turned it sweet. Then the Lord promised that if they walked in faithfulness to the covenant they would experience him as yahweh $r\bar{a}p\bar{a}$, "the LORD, who heals you" (Ex. 15:22–26). Similarly, in 2 Kings 2:19, the men of the city of Jericho appealed to Elisha because of the "bad water" of that city. This "bad water" was itself the result of the city's being under a covenant curse (see 1 Kings 16:34), yet God graciously transformed that curse into a blessing through his prophet (2 Kings 2:21–22).

In both cases, then, in spite of their past unfaithfulness, Israel experienced the Lord as their healer by turning to the prophet (Moses and Elisha respectively) and trusting in God's Word. So too in Ezekiel 47, the message is that God's transforming power flows out from the temple into the lives of sinners, healing them and restoring them to their place in the covenant community. In this context, the reference to the continued existence of the salt marshes (47:11) is not merely a footnote driven by the pragmatic necessities of life; such concerns are signally lacking in this vision. Rather, it is necessary that salt should be available as an element of covenant consummation.

(3) The third distinctive to be noted about the river of Ezekiel's vision is the way in which it runs counter to the general trend in this vision to separate off the holy from the profane, to protect the glory of the divine presence from contamination by sinful humankind. The river bridges the gap, demonstrating the fact that the protection of the sphere of the holy is not an end in itself. It is intended to ensure the presence of God in the midst of his people, a presence that will have visible and tangible effects of blessing for the people. Blessing is not a category restricted to those who have access to the inner reaches of the holy space; it flows out as widely as the river of life does. This does not yet mean global transformation and renewal, for the river itself flows only as far as the Dead Sea. But it means renewal for all who are part of God's covenant people, native-born Israelite and resident alien alike (cf. 47:22).¹¹

The river in the New Testament. In the New Testament, apart from Revelation 22 (see above), the Gospel of John develops this vision of Ezekiel most fully. Jesus tells the Samaritan woman that the water he gives will become a spring of water welling up to eternal life (John 4:14).

More explicitly still, Jesus stands up on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles and calls the thirsty to come and drink from him. He promises that "streams of living water will flow from within him," and John adds the interpretive note, "By this he meant the Spirit" (John 7:38–39). Against the background of Ezekiel 47, the imagery is transparent. The indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of believers, which was accomplished at Pentecost, turns each believer into a miniature temple. As such, he or she becomes not simply a separated sphere of holiness, a walled garden in the midst of a wasteland. Rather, the believer as a temple is to be a source of blessing to all around him or her, by transmitting to them the life-giving message of the gospel. By its transforming power, the gospel heals the spiritually dead, making them alive in Christ and fruitful in their service for God.

Contemporary Significance

THE WALLS OR THE RIVER? Christianity has always struggled against two pale imitations of itself, each of which seizes on one aspect of the truth and absolutizes it. On the one hand is legalism, which emphasizes the need for separation and distinctive living, for absolute obedience to the law. But legalism lacks the freedom and joy and fullness of life that are key marks of the Christian walk. On the other hand is antinomianism, the attitude that celebrates the freedom of being a Christian. But antinomianism tends to throw off any moral imperatives.

Legalism delights in preaching the walls of Ezekiel 40–46, but speaks only under its breath about the river of life in Ezekiel 47. Antinomianism loudly proclaims the wonderful benefits of the river of life, but does its best to conceal the walls of Ezekiel's temple by relegating them to a different time period in God's dealings with humankind.¹² Ezekiel's vision and the New Testament teachings that draw on it for inspiration hold together in creative tension walls and river, law and grace, as an eternal aspect of God's dealings with humankind.

Now I have never met anyone who admits to being a legalist or an antinomian; it is not a title like Calvinist or Arminian, Lutheran or Reformed, which devotees claim joyfully. Yet if we search our hearts honestly, most of us would probably find in our thinking about ourselves and in our presentation of the gospel a struggle over how to keep those biblical truths in balance. By nature, we are each drawn towards an unhealthy emphasis on either the walls or the river. Only Jesus has maintained the perfect balance between the two. On the one hand, he showed the rich young ruler a wall so high he could not cross it, whose gate was so narrow that he could not carry his wealth through with him (Matt. 19:16–24). On the other hand, he extended the gracious offer of living water without barriers to a despised Samaritan woman, whose marital history and present sexual involvement left much to be desired (John 4).

The example of Jesus shows us that keeping these truths in balance means that there is more than one way to present the gospel faithfully. Traditionally, most evangelistic efforts have presented sin as humanity's basic problem, forgiveness (freedom from the guilt of sin) as humanity's basic need, and the gospel as the means by which we reach the solution, peace with God. Historically, this presentation of the gospel has worked well in communities with a strong ethical-moral sense, where people generally feel an obligation to live up to a certain standard or code of morality. It is a way of showing those who believe in the existence of walls, like the rich young ruler, that they themselves are on the outside. This is essentially Paul's approach in the letter to the Romans: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God," "the wages of sin is death," but "there is . . . no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:23; 6:23, 8:1).

Increasingly, however, we are living in a society that is not merely immoral but amoral, unused to thinking in the categories of right and wrong.¹³ In such a postmodern society, where fewer and fewer people feel any sense of guilt over their lifestyle, it is important that we recognize there is another way of presenting the gospel. In this approach, similar to that which Jesus used with the Samaritan woman, the focus is on bondage or emptiness, not guilt, as humanity's basic problem. One's basic need then becomes liberation (freedom from the slavery and futility of sin), and the gospel is the means whereby we enter the freedom to be what we were created to be—God-centered worshipers. This is Paul's approach to the gospel in Galatians: You were in bondage to a futile, empty lifestyle, but Christ came to set you free.

The gospel as freedom and fullness. Ezekiel 47:1–12 presents the gospel as freedom and fullness. Life in all its fullness is what all God's people will experience through the renewing presence of God in their land. A temple-centered life, which is nothing less than a God-centered life, is the way to true freedom. The river that flows from that center has the power to take a dead life as well as a dead land and fill it with true health. Abandoning that center means nothing less than abandoning the source of all life.

Ironically, many people abandon the temple-centered life because they are in search of total freedom. They want a life without any rules and restrictions, without the kind of boundaries that Ezekiel 40–46 has so laboriously set up. But all they achieve is trading one center for another, the true God for idols. Sin is not just breaking the rules, it is living a life centered around something other than God. The testimony of Ezekiel 47 is that though such a life may seem to impart a kind of freedom, it really leads to bondage and death.

True freedom, the kind that comes from centering your life on the true and living God, is contagiously life-giving. Even the Dead Sea cannot hold out against its life-giving power. Life and fruitfulness are evident everywhere it flows. So also our lives as believers are to have an infectious attractiveness as people see something unique in us. What people taste as they come in contact with our lives should be honey, not gall. New covenant believers are themselves indwelt by the power of the Holy Spirit, so they become themselves miniature temples, centers from which lifegiving water will flow out to the nations (John 7:38). The thirsty world should find in the church the only drink that will slake their thirst. Regrettably, all too often we require sinners to get their act together before they are allowed anywhere near our fountains, for fear that they might contaminate them. Too many churches have hung up the spiritual equivalent of signs that say: "No shoes, no shirt, no service."

"Fishers of men." Just as the water is transformed in Jesus' interpretation from a physical to a spiritual flow, so also is the activity of those who stand beside it. In place of literal fishermen surrounding the Dead Sea, Jesus calls his disciples to be "fishers of men" (Mark 1:17). The mark of Jesus' resurrection power in John's Gospel is, not coincidentally, a miraculous catch of a huge number of fish, which closes out the careers of the disciples as ordinary fishermen and inaugurates their ministry as those through whom eternal life will be brought to the nations.

We too are called to be "fishers of men" in God's service, yet what kind of fishermen are we? What kind of fishermen wait for the fish to come to them and give up at the first refusal? On the contrary, effective fishermen take on themselves the task of pursuing the fish where they are and refusing to take no for an answer, studying diligently how best to increase their catch. One way or another, insofar as it lies in their power, they will land that fish.

Yet, lest in our enthusiasm for the gospel we become too triumphalist, Ezekiel 47 reminds us that God's work often starts out from small beginnings and progresses slowly. The mighty river of life, which at the end is too deep to cross, begins with the barest trickle. The temptation is for us to be impressed by large numbers and impressive presentation and to look down on the slow, steady work of the Spirit in building his church individual by individual. We seek reenactments of the Day of Pentecost, when three thousand believers were added to the church, and scorn the slow, steady accretion of Christians to the fold.

But the church of Jesus Christ, for all its impressive final form, when multitudes will flock in "from east and west and north and south, and will take their places at the feast in the kingdom of God" (Luke 13:29), often exists in the present as a trickle, not as a flood. God's work is often done in slow and steady ways that may never catch the headlines but nonetheless achieve his purposes. Our task, whether seeing the work of God progress like a mighty river or a dripping tap, is to seek to be faithful in centering our lives around Jesus Christ, our temple. We are called to taste the goodness of life in all its fullness in him, even in our present exile, and to point others joyfully to him as the source of our life.

Ezekiel 47:13–48:35

THIS IS WHAT THE Sovereign LORD says: "These are the boundaries by which you are to divide the land for an inheritance among the twelve tribes of Israel, with two portions for Joseph. ¹⁴You are to divide it equally among them. Because I swore with uplifted hand to give it to your forefathers, this land will become your inheritance.

15"This is to be the boundary of the land:

"On the north side it will run from the Great Sea by the Hethlon road past Lebo Hamath to Zedad, ¹⁶Berothah and Sibraim (which lies on the border between Damascus and Hamath), as far as Hazer Hatticon, which is on the border of Hauran. ¹⁷The boundary will extend from the sea to Hazar Enan, along the northern border of Damascus, with the border of Hamath to the north. This will be the north boundary.

¹⁸"On the east side the boundary will run between Hauran and Damascus, along the Jordan between Gilead and the land of Israel, to the eastern sea and as far as Tamar. This will be the east boundary.

¹⁹"On the south side it will run from Tamar as far as the waters of Meribah Kadesh, then along the Wadi of Egypt to the Great Sea. This will be the south boundary.

²⁰"On the west side, the Great Sea will be the boundary to a point opposite Lebo Hamath. This will be the west boundary.

²¹"You are to distribute this land among yourselves according to the tribes of Israel. ²²You are to allot it as an inheritance for yourselves and for the aliens who have settled among you and who have children. You are to consider them as nativeborn Israelites; along with you they are to be allotted an inheritance among the tribes of Israel. ²³In whatever tribe the alien settles, there you are to give him his inheritance," declares the Sovereign LORD.

^{48:1}"These are the tribes, listed by name: At the northern frontier, Dan will have one portion; it will follow the Hethlon road to Lebo Hamath; Hazar Enan and the northern border of Damascus next to Hamath will be part of its border from the east side to the west side.

²"Asher will have one portion; it will border the territory of Dan from east to west.

³"Naphtali will have one portion; it will border the territory of Asher from east to west.

⁴"Manasseh will have one portion; it will border the territory of Naphtali from east to west.

5"Ephraim will have one portion; it will border the territory of Manasseh from east to west.

⁶"Reuben will have one portion; it will border the territory of Ephraim from east to west.

⁷"Judah will have one portion; it will border the territory of Reuben from east to west.

8"Bordering the territory of Judah from east to west will be the portion you are to present as a special gift. It will be 25,000 cubits wide, and its length from east to west will equal one of the tribal portions; the sanctuary will be in the center of it.

⁹"The special portion you are to offer to the LORD will be 25,000 cubits long and 10,000 cubits wide. ¹⁰This will be the sacred portion for the priests. It will be 25,000 cubits long on the north side, 10,000 cubits wide on the west side, 10,000 cubits wide on the east side and 25,000 cubits long on the south side. In the center of it will be the sanctuary of the LORD. ¹¹This will be for the consecrated priests, the Zadokites, who were faithful in serving me and did not go astray as the Levites did when the Israelites went astray. ¹²It will be a special gift to them from the sacred portion of the land, a most holy portion, bordering the territory of the Levites.

¹³"Alongside the territory of the priests, the Levites will have an allotment 25,000 cubits long and 10,000 cubits wide. Its total length will be 25,000 cubits and its width 10,000 cubits. ¹⁴They must not sell or exchange any of it. This is the best of the land and must not pass into other hands, because it is holy to the LORD.

15"The remaining area, 5,000 cubits wide and 25,000 cubits long, will be for the common use of the city, for houses and for pastureland. The city will be in the center of it ¹⁶ and will have these measurements: the north side 4,500 cubits, the south side 4,500 cubits, the east side 4,500 cubits, and the west side 4,500 cubits. ¹⁷The pastureland for the city will be 250 cubits on the north, 250 cubits on the south, 250 cubits on the east, and 250 cubits on the west. ¹⁸What remains of the area, bordering on the sacred portion and running the length of it, will be 10,000 cubits on the east side and 10,000 cubits on the west side. Its produce will supply food for the workers of the city. ¹⁹The workers from the city who farm it will come from all the tribes of Israel. ²⁰The entire portion will be a square, 25,000 cubits on each side. As a special gift you will set aside the sacred portion, along with the property of the city.

²¹"What remains on both sides of the area formed by the sacred portion and the city property will belong to the prince. It will extend eastward from the 25,000 cubits of the sacred portion to the eastern border, and westward from the 25,000 cubits to the western border. Both these areas running the length of the tribal portions will belong to the prince, and the sacred portion with the temple sanctuary will be in the center of them. ²²So the property of the Levites and the property of the city will lie in the center of the area that belongs to the prince. The area belonging to the prince will lie between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin.

²³"As for the rest of the tribes: Benjamin will have one portion; it will extend from the east side to the west side.

²⁴"Simeon will have one portion; it will border the territory of Benjamin from east to west.

²⁵"Issachar will have one portion; it will border the territory of Simeon from east to west.

²⁶"Zebulun will have one portion; it will border the territory of Issachar from east to west.

²⁷"Gad will have one portion; it will border the territory of Zebulun from east to west.

²⁸"The southern boundary of Gad will run south from Tamar to the waters of Meribah Kadesh, then along the Wadi of Egypt to the Great Sea.

²⁹"This is the land you are to allot as an inheritance to the tribes of Israel, and these will be their portions," declares the Sovereign LORD.

³⁰"These will be the exits of the city: Beginning on the north side, which is 4,500 cubits long, ³¹the gates of the city will be named after the tribes of Israel. The three gates on the north side will be the gate of Reuben, the gate of Judah and the gate of Levi.

32"On the east side, which is 4,500 cubits long, will be three gates: the gate of Joseph, the gate of Benjamin and the gate of Dan.

33"On the south side, which measures 4,500 cubits, will be three gates: the gate of Simeon, the gate of Issachar and the gate of Zebulun.

³⁴"On the west side, which is 4,500 cubits long, will be three gates: the gate of Gad, the gate of Asher and the gate of Naphtali.

35"The distance all around will be 18,000 cubits. "And the name of the city from that time on will be:

THE LORD IS THERE."

Original Meaning

THE FINAL SECTION of Ezekiel's book records the delineation and distribution of the renewed land, continuing the trend of the vision to move outward from the temple. The land itself is oriented around the temple, however, and so the final section of the book will return to themes that have been central throughout the vision of chapters 40–48. In the same way as chapters 40–42 presented theology in architectural form, this final section renders theological concepts in geographical form. In both formats, the concepts of space, access, and position relative to the temple are crucial.

The passage opens with the description of the boundaries of the new Promised Land (Ezek. 47:13–20). The area circumscribed is broadly similar to the original area allotted to Moses in Numbers 34:1–12, stretching from Lebo Hamath in the north to the Wadi of Egypt and Meribah Kadesh³ in the south, and from the Mediterranean in the west to the Jordan River in the east.⁴ This is a larger area of territory than was ever controlled by Israel, even at the height of the Davidic empire; however, of greater significance than its absolute size is the fact that it is the same land that God promised to Moses. In receiving this land, the people receive the fulfillment of the covenant promise.

Strikingly absent from the land to be divided is the territory in the Transjordan (east of the Jordan River), which was occupied by Israel for much of its history. This land, historically the home of Reuben, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasseh, is no longer considered part of the Promised Land, for the simple reason that it was not part of the original promise.⁵ Even in Numbers 34, it is evident that the Transjordanian region is not part of the Promised Land proper. Although the fact of its reception by the two and a half tribes as their inheritance is mentioned (34:14–15), it lies outside the boundaries defined for the land itself.

Similarly, in the book of Joshua there is a clear distinction between the inheritance of the nine and a half tribes in Canaan, which it terms "the LORD's land" (Josh. 22:19), and the territory of the Transjordanian tribes. In Ezekiel 48, in line with this long-standing distinction, the more radical move is made to allot all twelve of the tribes land within the boundaries of the Promised Land proper. For Ezekiel, there can be no inheritance outside the land.

Equally radical is the distribution of the land itself (47:21–23). It is to be distributed "according to the tribes of Israel," which represents a return to the premonarchic state of affairs. In place of the preexilic historic reality of two divided kingdoms, the reunited people receive the land as twelve tribes. Yet it is a return to the beginning that takes into account the intervening history, for the twelve tribes are now united under a single "prince" (48:21).

Further, there is to be an inheritance in the land not merely for the native-born Israelite and his children but also for the resident alien ($g\bar{e}r$) and his children. In earlier Old Testament legislation, the $g\bar{e}r$ was considered consistently in need of special protection as part of a powerless class, subject to exploitation (Lev. 19:33). Because the $g\bar{e}r$ did not own land, he did not have the rights of full citizenship. But although socially a second-class citizen, the $g\bar{e}r$ was able to participate fully in religious affairs if he chose to do so. If he and his household were circumcised, he could partake of the Passover meal (Ex. 12:48), and he could present sacrifices to the Lord just like a native-born Israelite (Lev. 22:18). This provision recognized the fact that some resident aliens in Israel were proselytes, who had relocated for religious rather than economic reasons. The status of these proselytes is confirmed by Ezekiel through the allocation to them also of a hereditary portion in the renewed land. Given the significance of the land in Ezekiel 40–48, this is high privilege indeed.

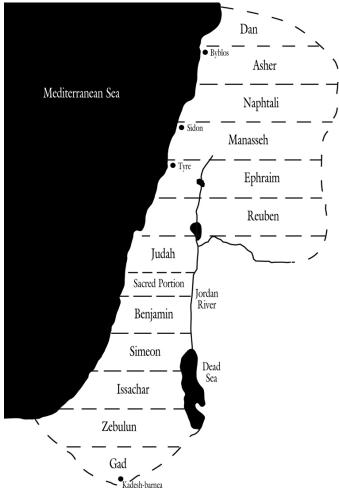

Figure 3. Ezekiel's Re(Vision) of the Land of Israel

In chapter 48, the prophet moves on to the division of the land itself among the tribes. Each of the twelve tribes is assigned an equal portion (47:14), running in a strip from east to west. This is not merely a fair way of dividing a country whose major topographic features run from north to south. It is far more fundamentally a way of orientating the entire land along the sacred east-west axis of the temple. The tribal strips themselves are left dimensionally undefined, with the borders between the tribes unmarked by geographic indicators. Only the central sacred portion has dimensions that are minutely recorded.

This contrasts dramatically with the division of the land in Joshua 14–21, whose roots are in historical rather than theological geography, where the boundaries between the different tribes are clearly defined. However, it corresponds exactly with the trend within the temple complex itself to define precisely the areas within the most holy zone, while leaving the outer areas less completely defined.⁸ Holy space is important, so it must be completely defined. Profane space is less significant and may therefore have blurred edges.

The arrangement of the tribes within the land is not a random process. The number twelve is maintained, even though the tribe of Levi has no portion of its own, by treating the two half-tribes descended from Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) as tribes in their own right, as in the original division of the land (Ezek. 47:13). The four tribes most distant from the sacred zone, and therefore in the position of least honor, are Dan, Asher, Naphtali, and Gad, the sons of Jacob's concubines, Zilpah and Bilhah (48:1–3, 27–28). The eight sons of Jacob's wives, Rachel and Leah, take the four strips immediately to the north and the four to the south of the sacred zone (48:4–7, 23–26).9 Of these, Benjamin and Judah, historically located immediately to the north and south of Jerusalem, are immediately north and south of the sacred zone (48:7, 23). Their historical order has been reversed, moving Judah to the north of the sacred reservation while Benjamin is on the south. This may be due to a desire to stress the integration of the new nation. No longer are they "north" and "south," "Israel" and "Judah"; now Judah itself, the royal nation, is part of the north.¹⁰

It should also be noted that the site of the temple itself seems to have migrated north in Ezekiel's vision. Given that the tribal strips are equal (47:14) and that there are seven to the north of the sacred reservation and five to the south, the site of the temple ought in strict geographical terms to be located somewhere close to Shiloh, thirty miles north of its old location." Although the vision (perhaps surprisingly) does not explicitly identify the location of the heart of the sacred portion within the renewed Israel, it would not be surprising to find that Ezekiel envisaged a change in place for the sanctuary. Given his radical assessment of the defilement of the temple's former home in Jerusalem, a location in the heartland of the old traditions, such as Shiloh, may well have proved attractive. Yet the shift in theological geography may also have been driven by a simple desire to locate the temple closer to the center of the land, in the midst of the people, while still (in deference to history) slightly south of center.

The sacred portion is certainly the spiritual center of the land (48:8–22; for the layout, see Fig. 2). Its importance is indicated not only by its physically central location and detailed dimensions but, in literary terms, by the amount of attention devoted to it. Whereas the other tribal portions can be taken up and dismissed in a single verse, the sacred portion receives no fewer than fifteen verses. The sacred strip is 25,000 cubits (almost eight miles) wide and extends across the breadth of the land (48:8). At its heart is a 25,000-cubit square, which is itself comprised of three east-west strips, two of 10,000 cubits breadth and one of 5,000 cubits.

The first of these 10,000-cubit strips is assigned to the Zadokite priests (48:10–11). It is (lit.) "a sacred portion within the sacred portion of the land" (48:12), a kind of Holy of Holies for the land. Within it is the sanctuary itself, which the priestly land surrounds as a buffer of holiness. The second 10,000-cubit strip, which most commentators locate to the north of the priestly portion, is allocated to the Levites (48:13). It too is privileged ground, "the best of the land" (48:14), and must not be sold into other hands.

The remaining 5,000-cubit strip along the southern edge of the sacred portion is the location of "the city" (48:15–19). The city, which occupies a 4,500-cubit (1.5 mile) square, is surrounded by a 250-cubit perimeter of pasture land and flanked by two strips of land stretching east and west for food production. In this way, the "holy" square shape is maintained in the middle of an east-west oriented strip. The city functions as a visible symbol and focus of the unity of the tribes, inhabited and maintained by workers from all of the tribes (48:19).

Flanking the square sacred portion on both sides and occupying the remainder of the sacred strip is the land belonging to the prince ($n\bar{a}s\,\hat{i}$, 48:21–22). This is land of an intermediate level of holiness. It is part of the sacred strip but not part of the central square. It is defined in one direction (25,000 cubits broad) but relatively undefined in the other (extending "to the eastern border" and "to the western border"). The purpose of this land is not the focus here. Rather, in this context it serves to indicate the prince's status: He ranks above the ordinary lay members of the tribes of Israel, yet below the priests and Levites. The entire land is assigned to God's people on the basis of a graded hierarchy, in exactly the same way (and with the same gradations) as was the temple itself.

The closing verses of the book (48:30–35) bring us back to contemplate the city and some of the major themes of the vision of chapters 40–48. The prophet notes the exits of the city, recalling 43:11, where the prophet was instructed to bring to the attention of the people the entrances and exits of the temple. Like the temple, the city is a precisely measured square. With its twelve gates, named for the twelve tribes of Israel (this time including Levi and counting Ephraim and Manasseh as one tribe, Joseph), the city functions as a visible focus of the unity of the restored people.

Yet the city is not an end in itself: It faces north, toward the temple, the center of the renewed land. For that reason, the north wall and north gates are described first and assigned to the favored tribes of Reuben, Judah, and Levi, the three most significant tribes descended from Leah. The other three tribes descended from Leah (Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun) are assigned the southern gates. The gates to the east are the tribes descended from Rachel (Joseph and Benjamin) and one from her servant Bilhah (Dan), while the least-favored west gates are assigned to Gad, Asher, and Naphtali, descendants of the concubines, Bilhah and Zilpah (48:34). ¹⁴

Finally, the city is given a new name, reflecting the focus of the entire temple vision: "THE LORD IS THERE" (yahweh šāmmâ, 48:35). At first sight, this seems to conflict with the earlier assertion that God is present in his temple, which has been separated from the city by a priestly buffer zone, protecting its holiness. However, the language of God's dual presence is necessary in order to communicate both God's transcendence and his immanence.¹⁵

Both of these themes have been developed in Ezekiel 40–48: The high walls of the temple underline God's transcendent presence in the midst of God's people but separate from them, while the river of life speaks of God's immanent presence for blessing in the midst of his people. Similarly, God's transcendence is emphasized in the separation of the temple from the city, while at the same time his immanence is asserted by the sacred shape given to the city and its new name, "THE LORD IS THERE."

Temple and city are where Ezekiel 40–48 started out (40:2), and they are where the vision ends. Both are transformed versions of the defiled and destroyed earthly institutions. In place of the earthly temple, contaminated by the sins of the people and abandoned by the presence of God (chs. 8–11), Ezekiel has seen an undefiled temple, refilled by God's glory (chs. 40–43). In place of an adulterous city named Jerusalem, which is put to death on account of her sins, Ezekiel has seen a holy city named "THE LORD IS THERE," the habitat of the twelve renewed tribes of Israel. In place of a devastated land, Ezekiel has seen a land of peace and prosperity, watered by the river of life. In short, Ezekiel's entire temple vision is the unfolding of his earlier prophecy:

I will make a covenant of peace with them; it will be an everlasting covenant. I will establish them and increase their numbers, and I will put my sanctuary among them forever. My dwelling place will be with them; I will be their God, and they will be my people. (37:26–27)

Bridging Contexts

THEOLOGY IN THE FORM of geography. The perspective of 47:13–48:35 is a modified utopianism. It is utopian in that it is a document whose message is drawn in broad strokes, setting out a better future in direct contrast to the past and to the existing state of affairs, without addressing the means whereby such change is to be brought about. Only the intervention of the Lord can bring about these changes. Yet it is not pure utopianism, since this Promised Land is not located somewhere over the rainbow, in a land where dreams come true. Redemption for Israel will take place not in an emerald city at the end of the yellow brick road, but rather in the land of Israel, which the Lord swore to give to the patriarchs.

In Ezekiel's vision, the past history of Israel is not abolished or ignored, with a return to some "perfect" earlier point in history. Rather, it is reformed and brought to its intended fulfillment. Thus, even though the land is divided among the twelve tribes, there is still room for a reformed monarchy in the figure of the prince. The historical "accidents" of birth are not abolished but continue to play a role in the location of the twelve tribes. This does not mean that we should therefore anticipate a "literal" future fulfillment of this chapter, any more than of the temple of Ezekiel 40–42. This section is "theology in the form of geography," just as the earlier depiction was theology in the form of architecture.

However, it is the history of promise and fulfillment that provides the background for the future hope. The God who covenanted with Abraham, who brought the twelve tribes out of Egypt, who provided the rebels with life-giving water at Meribah Kadesh, is the same God who will graciously restore the rebels of Ezekiel's day and provide for them life-giving water. The goal of chapters 40–48 is to encourage repentance, faithfulness, and hope: repentance over the sins of the past, faithfulness in the difficult present, and hope for a brighter future through God's grace.¹⁸

The book of Ezekiel in the light of the book of Revelation. Given this genre, how shall we appropriate the message of Ezekiel 40–48 in our very different situation? The best answer is to look again at how the New Testament appropriates its message. The book of Revelation adopts the central thrust of Ezekiel's vision, yet transforms it in important ways in the light of the fulfillment of the old covenant in Christ. The city that John sees is no longer called "THE LORD IS THERE" but "the new Jerusalem" (Rev. 21:2). That is certainly not because the Lord is not there in the new Jerusalem, but rather because Babylon has taken over from Jerusalem the role of the anti-heavenly city in Revelation. The city still has twelve gates with the names of the twelve tribes on them (21:12), but added to that are twelve foundations for the walls inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb (21:14).

Most strikingly, the city has no temple, not because the temple is sited elsewhere as in Ezekiel's vision, but because the Lord God and the Lamb are its temple (Rev. 21:22). Moreover, John's new Jerusalem is substantially larger than Ezekiel's, comprising a cube with sides 1,400 miles long, rather than a square with sides about eight miles long. In other words, the new Jerusalem is not a literal fulfillment of Ezekiel's vision but a creative appropriation of its central themes for the different situation of the early church.

The fundamental theme of Ezek. 47:13–48:35 is inheritance. For the landless people to whom Ezekiel's vision is communicated, the commitment is made that God's promise to Abraham and Isaac and to Moses will be fulfilled. God's people will ultimately possess the land as an inheritance for themselves and their descendants and the resident aliens, those whom God calls out from the nations to join them. They will finally enter their rest. The rest that the people of Joshua's day sought in vain in their conquest of the land will one day become a reality.

According to the New Testament it becomes a reality not through the reoccupation of the physical territory of Israel that Ezekiel has described but through a spiritual appropriation of the heavenly reality to which the land of Canaan always pointed. "Entering God's rest" is begun in this present age by faith (Heb. 3:18–19; 4:2–3), specifically faith in Christ, the One who came to bring rest to the "weary and burdened" (Matt. 11:28). Those who inherit the land in New Testament terminology are the meek (5:5), the sheep gathered from all nations (25:32–34). Those who will inherit are those who overcome in Christ, not simply those who may be physically descended from Abraham (Rev. 21:7). The land they seek to inherit does not stretch from Lebo Hamath to the Wadi of Egypt, like that of Ezekiel's vision. Rather, they seek the reality that Abraham sought and that Ezekiel tried to describe—the heavenly "city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10).

Contemporary Significance

THE VERTICAL DIMENSION. Does the person who dies with the most toys win? To the Israelites in exile, the temptation to think so was real. What significance could God and his ancient promise of a land of their own have to a people who felt abandoned by him and who had been exiled from his land? Why not just assimilate into the local culture and live to accumulate toys? Ezekiel's answer is to point the exiles up to God's heavenly temple and back to God's promises to Moses that Abraham's descendants would indeed inherit the land of Canaan.

Many people in the world in which we live are similarly driven by the desire to own and possess a significant slice of this world's action. In part, this is a natural response to the loss of a vertical dimension in their lives. Robbed of spiritual significance, what else is there for people to live for than material possessions? If our treasure is not stored up in heaven, where else shall we put it other than on the earth?

In the Beatitudes, Jesus points Christians in a different direction. Instead of envying and imitating the lifestyles of the rich and famous, Christians are to envy and emulate the meek, who act humbly and gently toward others based on a true estimate of their own standing before God (Matt. 5:5). ¹⁹ But why are the meek so blessed? Why should we envy their lifestyle so much and seek to imitate them? Because, according to Jesus, it is they who "will inherit the land."

Most English translations today render Jesus' words in the form that has become proverbial, "The meek will inherit the earth," but that translation obscures what it is that Jesus is promising. Jesus is here quoting from Psalm 37:11, which says, "The meek will inherit the land and enjoy great peace." "Land" gets across what he is driving at far better than "earth," because it carries overtones of God's promise to Israel, which spoke of a land that may only be possessed spiritually.²⁰ As the philosopher Nietzsche and the pop group "Tears for Fears" each expressed in their own way, "Everybody wants to rule the world"; but only those who are spiritual long for God's land. Just as God promised Abraham to give his descendants a spiritual land of their own, Jesus extends that same promise to the meek, those who are the citizens of his new kingdom.

But the meek will not invade the land. They will not overpower the land. They will not overrun the land because of their great might. They will inherit the land. It is God's gift to them, not the fruit of their own efforts. So it is with the temple-centered land of Ezekiel's vision. It is not offered to the rich and powerful, on sale for those who can afford its hefty price tag. Nor is it a program to be implemented by God's people to bring about heaven on earth, after their return from exile. The land they are to seek is a heavenly land, which they are to pursue by faith, just as did their ancestor Abraham (Heb. 11:8–10).

We then, as Christians, look upward and onward to our Promised Land, just as Ezekiel did. We look forward to a future city with foundations, a place where God will dwell in our midst and will wipe away all of our tears. We look forward to a place where suffering and sin will be no more, where all of God's children will be arrayed around the throne, inheriting the spiritual blessings that are ours in Christ.

Danger! The danger for Israel throughout the Old Testament was that they would become more attached to the earth than to the land, more interested in settling down and owning property than in seeking after God. That danger applies similarly to us, for we too can become more interested in possessing the earth, or at least a little part of it, than in inheriting the land. We long more for a rich, comfortable, easy life than for a dynamic spiritual walk with the Lord and a powerful witness to his glory and grace. As pastors, we want to build large, successful churches that will free us from the messiness of one-on-one pastoral ministry and enable us to bask in our achievements.

But that is not the way it should be for Christians! "Here we do not have an enduring city" (Heb. 13:14). This world is not our home; we are simply exiles here, resident aliens, whose hearts are elsewhere. This world's judgment on us is not what counts. What counts is God's judgment on us and the glorious inheritance that he in his mercy and grace has stored up for us.

As we wait, we are to live lives completely centered on the new covenant temple, Jesus himself (Heb. 12:22–28). Such lives revolve around the powerful worship of the awe-inspiring God, the living presence in our hearts of Jesus Christ our King, and the life-giving activity of his Spirit in our lives. So nourished, we are empowered to take the gospel out to all the nations of the earth. The inheritance that is ours in Christ is offered not simply to the twelve historic tribes of Israel, nor even to those who are resident aliens in their midst, but to all to whom the Word of God comes. As Peter put it on the day of Pentecost: "The promise is for you and for your children and for all who are far off—for all whom the Lord our God will call" (Acts 2:39).

Thus, the nations will be brought in from the north and south and east and west and will sit down to feast with one another in the heavenly city, and the Lord of hosts and the Lamb will be there in their midst. Then indeed the heavenly city, the new Jerusalem, will fittingly bear the name that Ezekiel ascribed to it, yahweh šāmmâ, "THE LORD IS THERE."

Scripture Index

Genesis

```
Ge 1-11; 294, 479-80
Ge 1; 337, 488, 524
Ge 1:2; 59, 337
Ge 1:20-21; 531
Ge 1:21; 355
Ge 1:24–28; 59
Ge 1:28; 406, 409
Ge 2; 427, 480, 488
Ge 2:1–4; 261
Ge 2:7; 69
Ge 2:10–14; 530, 532
Ge 2:17; 79, 480
Ge 3; 346, 479
Ge 3:1; 267–68, 295
Ge 3:5; 295, 350
Ge 3:6; 70
Ge 3:12–13; 123
Ge 3:15; 480
Ge 3:24; 278
Ge 4:6–7; 268
Ge 4:11-12; 480
Ge 4:20–22; 294
Ge 6; 117
Ge 6:9; 193, 240
Ge 6:13; 118
Ge 7:4; 288
Ge 7:11; 46, 288
Ge 8:1; 59
Ge 8:13; 46
Ge 9:6; 317
Ge 9:13–15; 37, 59
Ge 10:2; 453
Ge 11:2; 426
Ge 12; 480
Ge 12:3; 38, 326, 347, 454
```

```
Ge 12:10; 363
Ge 13:10; 363
Ge 15:16; 136, 213
Ge 16:1–4; 363
Ge 17:1; 505
Ge 17:7; 196, 422, 480
Ge 17:8; 388
Ge 18:23; 194
Ge 18:25; 319
Ge 19:4–9; 214
Ge 19:29; 196
Ge 20:7; 81
Ge 24:40; 505
Ge 25:22–23; 407
Ge 25:25–26; 153
Ge 25:29-34; 407
Ge 26:5; 505
Ge 27-28; 404
Ge 27:23; 154
Ge 27:41; 407
Ge 31:38–40; 400
Ge 32:28; 69
Ge 33; 404
Ge 49:9–10; 228, 247–48, 250, 277–78
```

Exodus

Ex 1:13–14; 394
Ex 3:8; 150, 209
Ex 3:14; 418
Ex 3:17; 209
Ex 4:22–23; 262
Ex 6:6–8; 150–51, 347, 359
Ex 7:4–5; 359
Ex 10:21–22; 375
Ex 12:12; 150, 359
Ex 12:23; 134
Ex 12:29; 161, 375
Ex 12:48; 543
Ex 14:4, 18; 109, 347, 359

```
Ex 15:4; 228
```

Ex 15:7; 202

Ex 15:22–27; 253, 532

Ex 15:23–24; 302

Ex 15:26; 119

Ex 17:7; 363

Ex 19:6; 228, 287, 418

Ex 20:5; 100, 196

Ex 22:26; 236

Ex 23:21; 419

Ex 24:1–11; 132, 500

Ex 24:8; 526

Ex 25–40; 438

Ex 28; 346

Ex 28:38; 89

Ex 31:16-17; 261

Ex 32; 261, 302, 364

Ex 32:7–14; 68, 113, 405

Ex 32:13; 49

Ex 33:11; 264

Ex 33:18–23; 56, 492

Ex 34:6; 49, 100, 137

Ex 34:14; 100, 114

Ex 34:29–30; 492

Ex 40:34–37; 147, 440, 492

Leviticus

Le 1:4; 313

Le 2:13; 492

Le 3:2; 313

Le 4:14; 518

Le 8:22–23; 492

Le 8:35; 501

Le 10:1-3; 503

Le 10:6; 318

Le 10:10–11; 417

Le 10:17; 89

Le 11:4; 416

Le 11:5; 154

```
Le 11:16; 27
Le 13:45–46; 417
Le 15; 415
Le 15:2–15; 417
Le 15:19–24; 413
Le 16; 518, 547
Le 16:8; 314
Le 17–26; 286
Le 17; 184
Le 17:6; 291
Le 17:11; 291, 316
Le 17:13; 291, 314, 317
Le 18–20; 286, 289
Le 19; 286–87
Le 19:33; 542
Le 20; 286–87
Le 20:4; 289
Le 20:9–21; 235
Le 20:10; 307
Le 21; 318
Le 21:6; 417
Le 22:2; 417
Le 22:18; 543
Le 25; 286, 289
Le 25:8–13; 470
Le 25:13; 520
Le 25:36–37; 236
Le 25:43, 46; 394
Le 26; 99–101, 104, 107–9, 114, 193, 196, 385, 396
Le 26:19; 288
Le 26:40; 193
Le 26:44–45; 100
Le 27:28; 504
```

Numbers

Nu 2; 546 Nu 3:32; 448 Nu 5:12; 193 Nu 5:13; 183

```
Nu 5:27; 193
```

Nu 6:27; 419

Nu 11:1; 279

Nu 11:5; 304, 362

Nu 11:16-30; 132

Nu 11:24-25; 259

Nu 11:29; 430

Nu 12:6–8; 30, 56

Nu 13-14; 241

Nu 13:1–2; 261

Nu 13:26–33; 302, 406

Nu 14:15–16; 262, 414

Nu 14:33; 89

Nu 14:34; 90

Nu 16; 302

Nu 16:35; 279

Nu 17:6–10; 435

Nu 18:25-29; 504

Nu 20:13; 541

Nu 20:14-21; 407

Nu 20:14–15; 324

Nu 24:17; 228

Nu 25; 302

Nu 28; 518

Nu 28:4; 520

Nu 33:4; 359

Nu 34:2; 405

Nu 34:1-12; 541

Nu 34:14–15; 541

Nu 34:18; 517

Deuteronomy

Dt 4:34; 264, 372

Dt 6:13, 16; 364

Dt 7:18; 304

Dt 8:3; 363

Dt 8:7; 426

Dt 8:14, 19; 286

Dt 9:25; 262

Dt 10:16; 239 Dt 11:11; 426

Dt 11:13-14; 186

Dt 12; 107

Dt 12:5; 419

Dt 12:10; 57, 437

Dt 12:11; 99, 152, 419

Dt 12:16, 24; 314, 317

Dt 12:27; 317

Dt 13:1-5; 185

Dt 13:9; 100, 108

Dt 15:15; 304

Dt 16:3, 12; 304

Dt 17:14-20; 228

Dt 18:9; 260

Dt 18:15, 18; 56

Dt 18:22; 92

Dt 22:22; 213

Dt 23:7-8; 324, 408

Dt 23:9–14; 503

Dt 24:16; 235, 237

Dt 24:18, 22; 304

Dt 26:5; 209

Dt 28; 118

Dt 29:22–28; 414

Dt 30:15–20; 239–40

Dt 32:16; 131

Dt 32:47; 278

Dt 32:48-52; 471

Dt 33:20; 248

Joshua

Jos 2:12-13; 196

Jos 5:13; 278

Jos 6:17; 196

Jos 6:21; 134

Jos 7; 195

Jos 7:1; 193

Jos 10:6; 209

```
Jos 12–21; 517, 544
Jos 15–19; 150
Jos 22:19; 542
```

Judges

Jdg 9:7–20; 223

Ruth

Ru 3:9; 210

1 Samuel

```
1Sa 1:27–28; 154

1Sa 2:35; 507

1Sa 4; 228

1Sa 4:22; 57

1Sa 7:2–14; 228

1Sa 8; 263

1Sa 8:5; 154

1Sa 8:20; 228

1Sa 9:7; 175

1Sa 13:14; 396

1Sa 16:7; 184

1Sa 17:46; 450
```

2 Samuel

```
2Sa 1:19–27; 246

2Sa 4:11–13; 79

2Sa 5:2; 394

2Sa 7; 210

2Sa 7:1; 57, 437

2Sa 7:12; 396

2Sa 7:16; 226

2Sa 7:25; 396

2Sa 8:14; 407

2Sa 10:4; 98

2Sa 12:1–10; 200, 308

2Sa 21:1–9; 196

2Sa 21:13–14; 356
```

1 Kings

```
1Ki 2:3; 505
1Ki 3:2; 107
1Ki 4:2; 154
1Ki 6; 438
1Ki 6:29; 476
1Ki 7:2; 224
1Ki 7:23, 39; 530
1Ki 7:48; 477
1Ki 8:10–11; 56, 153, 489, 492
1Ki 8:25; 505
1Ki 8:27; 152
1Ki 8:28–54; 475
1Ki 8:29; 152
1Ki 8:51; 202
1Ki 9:3; 290
1Ki 9:4; 505
1Ki 10:29; 209
1Ki 11:7–8; 211
1Ki 12:7, 25–33; 436
1Ki 12:28–33; 214
1Ki 13:2; 108
1Ki 14:15; 356
1Ki 16:34; 532
1Ki 17; 241
1Ki 17:17–24; 426, 430
1Ki 18:29, 36; 520
1Ki 20:28; 106
1Ki 20:35–43; 92
1Ki 21:1–16; 517
1Ki 22; 185
```

2 Kings

2Ki 2:19; 532 2Ki 2:21–22; 533 2Ki 4:18–37; 426, 430 2Ki 6:32; 131 2Ki 8:20; 407 2Ki 11:5; 501 2Ki 11:14-19; 501 2Ki 11:15-16; 134 2Ki 13:15-19; 276 2Ki 13:21; 426, 430 2Ki 16:3; 211 2Ki 16:5–7; 303 2Ki 16:7–8; 212 2Ki 16:10–16; 212, 501 2Ki 17; 19, 214, 216 2Ki 17:9-10; 211 2Ki 17:26; 248 2Ki 18:5; 357 2Ki 18:21; 356 2Ki 19:35; 19 2Ki 20:12–19; 212, 303 2Ki 20:13; 19 2Ki 20:14–18; 20 2Ki 20:19; 20 2Ki 21:6; 211 2Ki 21:13; 214 2Ki 22:3–14; 132 2Ki 23:4–7, 9; 107 2Ki 23:16; 108 2Ki 23:26; 239 2Ki 23:30; 240 2Ki 23:33; 110, 247 2Ki 23:34; 20, 247 2Ki 24:17; 21 2Ki 25; 50 2Ki 25:21; 149

1 Chronicles

1Ch 5:24; 154 1Ch 7:40; 448 1Ch 21:16; 278 1Ch 22:9; 57

1Ch 28:9; 505

2 Chronicles

2Ch 1:17; 209 2Ch 7:1–2; 35 2Ch 7:14; 416 2Ch 12:3; 363 2Ch 20; 120 2Ch 23:1; 45 2Ch 26:19; 132 2Ch 36:13; 227

Ezra

Ezr 1; 153 Ezr 2:62–63; 173

Nehemiah

Ne 1:1; 46 Ne 2:1; 46 Ne 4:3; 172 Ne 7:63–64; 173 Ne 12:37–43; 519

Job

Job 1:8; 193 Job 2:10; 317 Job 13:15; 340 Job 22:9; 371

Psalms

Ps 2; 405, 455, 461
Ps 2:12; 462
Ps 10:1; 149
Ps 10:15; 371
Ps 15; 235, 290
Ps 16; 29
Ps 18:4–19; 430
Ps 18:9–14; 58
Ps 19; 496
Ps 22; 29
Ps 23:1; 397

```
Ps 24:3; 290, 500
Ps 26:6; 108, 519
Ps 27:5; 120
Ps 28:1; 335
Ps 42:4; 519
Ps 46; 455, 530
Ps 46:1; 462
Ps 46:5; 291
Ps 48; 211, 290, 336, 455
Ps 48:2; 210, 336, 449
Ps 49; 373
Ps 49:14–15; 429
Ps 51:10–11; 423
Ps 68:24; 519
Ps 72:1-4; 286
Ps 73:3, 25–28; 508
Ps 76; 455
Ps 80:8-9; 201, 224
Ps 88:3; 373
Ps 88:4; 335
Ps 93:3–4; 337, 530
Ps 95:5; 530
Ps 96:11; 530
Ps 98:7; 530
Ps 103:12; 547
Ps 104:8; 426
Ps 106:7–39; 302
Ps 106:23; 290
Ps 118:27; 108
Ps 121:1; 236
Ps 122; 290
Ps 126:1; 49
Ps 127:1-3; 250
Ps 137:1-4; 48
Ps 137:7-8; 48
Ps 137:7; 407
```

Proverbs

Ps 143:7; 335

Pr 16:33; 36, 242 Pr 22:6; 303 Pr 26:9; 234 Pr 28:15; 248

Song of Songs

So 2:7; 304 So 3:5; 304 So 8:4; 304

Isaiah

Is 1:9–10; 214 Is 1:21–31; 288 Is 1:25–26; 202 Is 2:2–4; 448 Is 2:2–3; 471 Is 5:1-7; 200-201, 224 Is 5:24; 202 Is 6; 56 Is 6:5; 36, 493 Is 6:6–7; 57, 493 Is 6:8; 81 Is 6:11; 57 Is 7:1–2; 303 Is 7:14; 29, 493 Is 7:20; 98 Is 8:8; 493 Is 9:6; 524 Is 10:33; 226 Is 11:1; 226, 253 Is 11:2–16; 253 Is 14; 348 Is 14:13; 449 Is 14:25; 106 Is 14:28; 162 Is 25:2; 416 Is 30:1–7; 227 Is 30:27; 419

Is 31:1–3; 227

Is 31:8; 278 Is 33:14; 396 Is 33:15; 235 Is 34:2–10; 407 Is 34:5–6; 278 Is 36–37; 57 Is 36:6; 356 Is 38:3; 505 Is 39:5–8; 171 Is 40:1–2; 49 Is 40:3; 30 Is 40:15–24; 325 Is 42:6; 361 Is 44:6–20; 109 Is 45; 278 Is 48:10; 202, 288 Is 49:4; 75 Is 49:6; 361 Is 49:9; 82 Is 51:2–3; 385, 415 Is 51:9; 355 Is 53:3, 7; 86 Is 56:7; 475 Is 56:10; 78 Is 57:19; 109 Is 61:1; 82 Is 63; 407 Is 65:9; 106

Jeremiah

Jer 1; 60 Jer 2:21; 201 Jer 2:36; 212 Jer 4–6; 449 Jer 5:1–2; 152 Jer 6:14; 91, 172 Jer 6:17; 78 Jer 6:27–30; 288 Jer 7:4; 57

```
Jer 7:12–15; 57
Jer 7:31; 107, 211
Jer 8:10–11; 37, 91, 172
```

Jer 12:12; 279

Jer 13:16; 161

Jer 15:14; 279

Jer 15:16; 70

Jer 17:4; 279

Jer 17:9; 424

Jer 19:1–13; 92

Jer 19:5; 211

Jer 22:13–17; 248

Jer 22:23; 224

Jer 23:3; 288

Jer 24:8–10; 253

Jer 26:8; 183

Jer 26:11; 57

Jer 26:24; 132

Jer 28; 131

Jer 29:1; 259

Jer 29:3; 132

Jer 29:5; 149

Jer 29:11; 252

Jer 29:14; 288

Jer 29:15–23; 49

Jer 29:21–23; 253

Jer 31:8, 10; 288

Jer 32:17; 250

Jer 32:35; 107, 211

Jer 32:37; 288

Jer 32:39; 151

Jer 37:5; 371

Jer 38:25; 148

Jer 39:1; 371

Jer 39:14; 132

Jer 49:5; 288

Jer 49:31; 416

Jer 51:59–64; 325

Lamentations

```
Lam 2:18; 48
Lam 3:22–23; 60, 252
Lam 3:42; 49
Lam 3:49; 48
Lam 4:12; 57
Lam 4:13; 49
Lam 4:20; 228, 373
Lam 5:7; 235
Lam 5:15; 48
Lam 5:18; 172
Lam 5:21; 49
```

Ezekiel

```
Eze 1–24; 22, 38, 382–83
Eze 1:1–3:15; 60
Eze 1; 35, 78, 147, 346
Eze 1:1; 56, 470
Eze 1:2-3; 19, 25, 426, 470-71
Eze 1:4; 274
Eze 1:27; 17, 131
Eze 1:28; 37, 68, 78, 135, 427
Eze 2–3; 433
Eze 2; 79
Eze 2:2; 427
Eze 2:3; 263
Eze 2:5–8; 313
Eze 2:5; 171
Eze 2:6; 93
Eze 2:7; 79
Eze 3; 238
Eze 3:7; 151
Eze 3:9; 313
Eze 3:14; 426
Eze 3:17–21; 174–75
Eze 3:22; 426
Eze 3:23–24; 427
Eze 3:26–27; 37, 313, 316, 384
```

Eze 4–5; 103

```
Eze 4; 103, 130
Eze 4:5; 99
Eze 4:6; 357
Eze 5; 37, 107, 109, 117
Eze 5:2; 304
Eze 5:3; 37, 109
Eze 5:5; 290, 448
Eze 5:11; 414
Eze 5:16; 119
Eze 5:17; 106
Eze 6; 117, 405
Eze 6:3–7; 235
Eze 6:8; 37
Eze 6:11; 276
Eze 6:12; 148
Eze 6:14; 173, 404
Eze 7; 37, 130, 275
Eze 7:4; 130, 414
Eze 7:5, 6, 7; 275
Eze 7:9; 134
Eze 7:12; 275
Eze 7:14; 275
Eze 7:20; 130, 151
Eze 7:23; 130
Eze 8–11; 35, 47, 130, 154–55, 160, 199, 479, 481, 489, 547
Eze 8–9; 146
Eze 8; 35, 152, 183, 436, 472
Eze 8:1; 259, 426
Eze 8:10; 303
Eze 8:12; 154, 160
Eze 8:16; 491
Eze 8:18; 414
Eze 9; 35, 146
Eze 9:4; 37, 275
Eze 9:5; 414
Eze 9:6; 37, 150
Eze 9:8; 150
Eze 9:9–11; 150
Eze 9:9; 37, 160
Eze 9:10; 414
```

```
Eze 10–11; 35, 130
```

- Eze 11:21; 290
- Eze 11:24-25; 130
- Eze 11:25; 160, 171
- Eze 12; 37
- Eze 12:2-3, 9; 313
- Eze 12:15; 287, 357
- Eze 12:22; 428
- Eze 12:25; 313
- Eze 13; 289
- Eze 13:5; 290
- Eze 13:7; 277
- Eze 14; 199, 259, 345
- Eze 14:1; 131, 259
- Eze 14:3; 259, 416
- Eze 14:4; 260
- Eze 14:9; 173
- Eze 14:11; 170
- Eze 14:12-15:8; 200
- Eze 14:12-23; 201
- Eze 14:12–20; 37
- Eze 14:13; 173, 199
- Eze 14:16; 199
- Eze 15; 37, 209, 217, 259
- Eze 16; 36, 247, 259, 301, 310
- Eze 16:3; 237
- Eze 16:6, 22; 249
- Eze 16:27; 173

```
Eze 16:29; 223
```

Eze 16:41-42; 170

Eze 16:46; 147, 297

Eze 16:49-51; 36

Eze 16:54; 451

Eze 16:59; 225

Eze 16:63; 170

Eze 17; 37, 162, 237, 247, 249, 259

Eze 17:2; 30–31

Eze 17:12; 313

Eze 17:15; 212

Eze 17:19–21; 162

Eze 17:20; 193

Eze 17:22–24; 250, 253, 277

Eze 18; 37, 259–60, 383

Eze 18:6; 286

Eze 18:9; 260

Eze 18:11; 286

Eze 18:13; 260

Eze 18:15; 286

Eze 18:31-32; 383

Eze 19; 162, 237, 259, 277

Eze 19:8; 374

Eze 19:11; 372

Eze 20; 36, 183, 239

Eze 20:1; 131, 259

Eze 20:3; 416

Eze 20:4-29; 237

Eze 20:23; 287, 357

Eze 20:30-42; 150

Eze 20:30-32; 237

Eze 20:32; 324

Eze 20:35–36; 90, 356

Eze 20:37; 287

Eze 20:41; 288

Eze 21; 36–37, 285

Eze 21:8–17; 36

Eze 21:12; 450

Eze 21:21; 36

Eze 21:27; 247

```
Eze 21:30-32; 307
```

Eze 22; 36, 305, 314

Eze 22:5; 148

Eze 22:7–12; 36

Eze 22:15; 357

Eze 22:19-22; 314-15

Eze 22:25-29; 24, 176

Eze 22:25; 247

Eze 22:26; 417, 502

Eze 22:30; 37

Eze 23; 36, 490

Eze 23:3; 36

Eze 23:24; 277

Eze 23:27; 170

Eze 24; 37–38, 382, 384

Eze 24:17, 23; 503

Eze 24:26; 382

Eze 24:27; 22, 382

Eze 25–32; 37, 194, 307, 316, 323, 382, 454

Eze 25–29; 323, 355

Eze 25; 333, 338

Eze 25:3; 90

Eze 25:7; 173

Eze 25:12–14; 173, 404

Eze 25:16; 173

Eze 26–27; 344, 349, 357

Eze 26:19–20; 345–46

Eze 27; 346, 348, 373

Eze 28; 194, 333, 373

Eze 28:3; 194

Eze 28:13-14; 373

Eze 28:19–26; 333

Eze 28:25; 288

Eze 29; 373-74

Eze 29:12-13; 90, 288

Eze 30–32; 323

Eze 31:3, 10, 14; 249

Eze 33; 37, 316, 454

Eze 33:1–9; 174–75

Eze 33:2–3; 78

```
Eze 33:21–22; 22, 38
```

```
Eze 39:28; 170
Eze 40–48; 30, 47, 264, 426, 435, 437–39, 454, 479–80, 482, 488, 517–18, 522, 524, 541, 543, 547–48
Eze 40–43; 131, 541, 547–48
Eze 40; 515
Eze 40:1; 334, 426
Eze 40:2; 231, 426, 547
Eze 40:6–8; 26
Eze 40:16; 26
Eze 42:13-14; 503
Eze 42:16–20; 515
Eze 43; 36, 485
Eze 43:1–5; 38, 153
Eze 43:7; 170
Eze 43:8; 480
Eze 43:10–12; 472, 479, 501, 546
Eze 43:17; 519
Eze 44:4; 520
Eze 44:6–16; 38
Eze 44:6; 313
Eze 44:7; 480
Eze 44:11; 134
Eze 44:16; 477
Eze 44:19; 481
Eze 44:23–24; 289, 417
Eze 44:28–30; 477, 514
Eze 45; 546
Eze 45:8; 170
Eze 45:17; 39
Eze 46:16–18; 38, 471
Eze 46:24; 489
Eze 47; 39, 479
Eze 47:13–48:35; 514
Eze 47:16; 110
Eze 48; 39, 150, 455, 479
Eze 48:1; 110
Eze 48:20; 515
```

Daniel

Da 2:21-23, 47; 345

```
Da 4:6; 345
Da 4:10–12; 373
Da 4:18; 345
Da 5:12; 345
Da 7; 71–72
Da 11:34; 151
```

Hosea

Hos 1:9; 68, 215 Hos 1:11; 436 Hos 2:4–14; 211 Hos 2:23; 408 Hos 9:8; 78 Hos 11:8–11; 263

Joel

Joe 2:2; 395 Joe 2:3; 415 Joe 2:28–29; 71, 430

Amos

Am 1:1; 45 Am 1:2; 57 Am 5:4–5; 259 Am 5:18–20; 118 Am 8:1–2; 118 Am 9:11; 396

Obadiah

Ob 1–15; 408 Ob 7; 359 Ob 11–14; 324

Jonah

Jon 2:7; 109 Jon 3:4; 74

Micah

```
Mic 5:2; 29
Mic 7:18–19; 385
```

Nahum

```
Nah 1:3; 58
Nah 2:12–13; 248
Nah 3:5; 213
```

Habakkuk

```
Hab 1:13; 103
Hab 2:2-3; 171
```

Zephaniah

```
Zep 1:11; 223
Zep 1:15; 395
Zep 3:3-4; 24, 176, 289
```

Haggai

```
Hag 2:6; 151
Hag 2:12; 481
```

Zechariah

```
Zec 2; 462
Zec 4:10; 250, 532
Zec 13:7, 9; 279
Zec 14:21; 223
```

Malachi

```
Mal 1:4; 408
Mal 3:2; 103, 202, 279, 288
```

Matthew

```
Mt 1:23; 494
Mt 2:4–5; 29
Mt 3:17; 525
```

```
Mt 4:1–11; 363
```

- Mt 4:8; 338
- Mt 5–7; 401
- Mt 5:5; 549
- Mt 5:17; 401
- Mt 5:39–42; 138
- Mt 5:48; 423
- Mt 6:9; 419
- Mt 7:14; 495
- Mt 7:22-23; 179
- Mt 7:24–27; 180
- Mt 9:11; 231
- Mt 9:12–13; 388
- Mt 9:36; 400
- Mt 10:34; 279
- Mt 10:38; 96
- Mt 11:19; 156
- Mt 11:28; 549
- Mt 13:1-23; 84
- Mt 13:5–6; 388
- Mt 13:31; 532
- Mt 16:26; 230, 508
- Mt 17:2; 494
- Mt 18:20; 156, 191, 419
- Mt 19:16–22; 84, 534
- Mt 19:16; 115
- Mt 20:1–16; 506
- Mt 21:1–13; 494
- Mt 21:5; 231
- Mt 21:9; 401
- Mt 22:32; 430
- Mt 23:37–24:3; 153
- Mt 24:1–2; 156
- Mt 25:21; 124, 505, 507
- Mt 25:32; 397, 549
- Mt 25:34, 41; 410
- Mt 27:39–40; 104
- Mt 27:45; 297
- Mt 27:46; 95
- Mt 28:19; 409, 419

Mark

Mk 1:17; 536 Mk 4:30–32; 231 Mk 8:34–35; 459 Mk 9:12–13; 18 Mk 10:38; 509 Mk 10:45; 72, 218, 509, 525

Luke

Lk 1:32-33, 52; 230 Lk 1:68–69; 365 Lk 3:4; 30 Lk 4:18; 73, 270 Lk 6:38; 328 Lk 9:54; 72, 138 Lk 12:15; 508 Lk 12:33; 508 Lk 12:49; 279 Lk 13:23-24; 167 Lk 13:29; 537 Lk 14:16–24; 155 Lk 15:4-6; 397 Lk 17:1–3; 361 Lk 18:11; 219, 360 Lk 19:17–19; 507 Lk 22:12; 348 Lk 24:25–27; 31 Lk 24:44–47; 31

John

Jn 1:5; 481 Jn 1:11; 75 Jn 1:12; 419 Jn 1:14; 39, 73, 153, 156, 440, 481, 494 Jn 1:29; 525 Jn 2:11; 494

```
Jn 2:19; 156, 440, 481
Jn 3:3; 158
Jn 3:5; 422
Jn 3:16; 95
Jn 4:14; 533
Jn 4:21–24; 440
Jn 4:22; 441
Jn 4:23; 153
Jn 5:39; 18
Jn 7:38–39; 533, 536
Jn 8:39; 197
Jn 9:3; 63, 203, 242
Jn 10:11; 39, 397
Jn 10:16; 397, 441
Jn 11:24; 429
Jn 12:27–29; 75, 419, 527
Jn 12:32; 221
Jn 13:31–32; 527
Jn 15; 203
Jn 15:6; 409
Jn 15:9–17; 64
Jn 15:16, 18; 409
Jn 16:13; 18
Jn 16:15; 76
Jn 16:33; 398
Jn 17:21; 442
Jn 17:23; 179, 439
Jn 19:30; 190
```

Acts

Ac 1:8; 165 Ac 2; 71, 430 Ac 2:4; 71 Ac 2:23; 317 Ac 2:38–39; 361 Ac 2:39; 388, 422, 551 Ac 2:42–47; 54 Ac 3:18; 32 Ac 3:21, 24; 32

```
Ac 10:10–16; 96
Ac 10:15; 418
Ac 11:5–10; 96
Ac 12:22; 349
Ac 15:14; 412
Ac 17; 111, 142
Ac 17:2–3; 33
Ac 17:11; 179
Ac 17:16, 22; 111
Ac 17:30–31; 111
Ac 20:23; 82
Ac 20:28–29; 397
Ac 26:22–23; 33
```

Romans

Ro 8:31–32; 462

```
Ro 1:18-25; 186
Ro 1:18; 71, 421
Ro 1:21–23; 495
Ro 1:25; 377
Ro 1:26–28; 186
Ro 1:27; 122
Ro 2:4–5; 122, 138
Ro 3:22; 506
Ro 3:23; 123, 164, 197, 219, 242, 254, 293, 496, 505, 535
Ro 5:1; 398
Ro 5:12-20; 196
Ro 6:4; 509
Ro 6:8; 432
Ro 6:14; 496
Ro 6:23; 535
Ro 8:1; 104, 535
Ro 8:4, 11, 12; 433
Ro 8:13; 423
Ro 8:16; 432
Ro 8:17–25; 401, 508
Ro 8:17; 509
Ro 8:28; 54, 123
Ro 8:30; 421
```

Ro 8:35–39; 446 Ro 8:35; 123, 401 Ro 8:37; 54 Ro 9:6; 409–10 Ro 9:11, 18; 408 Ro 10:9; 441 Ro 11:17–24; 361 Ro 11:17; 409 Ro 11:22; 113, 410 Ro 11:26; 409 Ro 12:17–21; 138

1 Corinthians

1Co 1:10; 442

1Co 1:18–23; 482

1Co 1:18; 351

1Co 1:20; 350

1Co 1:23; 95

1Co 1:24; 351

1Co 1:27; 157

1Co 2:2; 33

1Co 2:9; 252

1Co 3:11-15; 506

1Co 3:13; 279

1Co 3:15; 280

1Co 4:7; 217

1Co 5:1-5; 442

1Co 6:9-11; 96, 309

1Co 6:11; 96, 421

1Co 7:29-31; 319

1Co 9:22; 74

1Co 10:14; 140

1Co 10:16; 220

1Co 10:21-22; 141

1Co 11:19; 442

1Co 11:25; 220, 526

1Co 12:3; 441

1Co 13:12; 442

```
1Co 14:6, 8; 179
1Co 15:12; 432
1Co 15:20–23; 433
1Co 15:44–49; 73, 401
1Co 15:45–54; 351
```

2 Corinthians

2Co 2:15-16; 73, 84 2Co 3:3; 96, 165 2Co 4:5; 71 2Co 4:7-10; 204 2Co 4:7; 71 2Co 5:10; 124, 328 2Co 5:17; 39, 158 2Co 5:20; 83 2Co 6:4–10; 82 2Co 6:14–7:1; 482 2Co 6:16; 156 2Co 7:1; 96 2Co 11:14; 326 2Co 12:7; 82 2Co 12:9; 463 2Co 13:14; 102

Galatians

Gal 1:8; 112 Gal 3:28; 441 Gal 5:12; 112 Gal 5:22–26; 64 Gal 6:15–16; 360, 409, 430

Ephesians

```
Eph 1-3; 34
Eph 1:3; 102, 231, 398
Eph 1:7; 102
Eph 2:1; 71, 74, 166, 294, 431
Eph 2:3; 83, 103, 158, 219, 294, 420, 462
Eph 2:5-6; 219
```

```
Eph 2:8-10; 187, 421, 433
Eph 2:11–12; 418, 440, 482
Eph 2:12; 486
Eph 2:13–15; 398
Eph 2:13; 361
Eph 2:17-18; 71
Eph 2:19–22; 102, 361
Eph 2:20; 441
Eph 3:20-21; 35
Eph 4–6; 34
Eph 4:13; 441
Eph 4:18; 83
Eph 5:2; 268
Eph 5:18; 39
Eph 5:26; 422
Eph 6:10–18; 138
```

Philippians

Php 2:7–8; 181, 525 Php 2:9; 231 Php 2:10–11; 164 Php 3:2; 112 Php 4:5, 7; 398

Colossians

Col 1:15; 351 Col 1:27–28; 433 Col 2:12–14; 431 Col 3:1–2; 53

1 Thessalonians

1Th 4:13; 424 1Th 5:9–10; 104

2 Thessalonians

2Th 2:11–12; 186

1 Timothy

1Ti 1:13; 410 1Ti 1:15; 424

2 Timothy

2Ti 1:12; 462 2Ti 2:9; 82 2Ti 2:19; 85 2Ti 3:5; 63 2Ti 3:16; 18, 27 2Ti 4:1–5; 251

Hebrews

Heb 1:1–2; 54, 527 Heb 1:3; 494 Heb 2:8–10; 54 Heb 2:17–18; 398, 508 Heb 3:18–19; 549 Heb 4:2–3; 549 Heb 4:15–16; 398, 508 Heb 4:16; 39, 486 Heb 7:25; 486 Heb 8:1; 486 Heb 9:9; 90 Heb 9:11–15; 39, 521 Heb 9:12; 494 Heb 9:22; 547 Heb 9:23; 494, 526 Heb 9:27; 121 Heb 10:1–11; 90 Heb 10:10; 39 Heb 10:11-12; 494 Heb 10:12–14; 525 Heb 10:19; 39 Heb 10:26-31; 319, 461 Heb 10:31; 83 Heb 11:1-2; 53

Heb 11:10; 549–50

```
Heb 11:13–16; 53
Heb 12:11; 203, 340
Heb 12:21; 103
Heb 12:22–24; 270, 551
Heb 13:5–6; 462
Heb 13:12–13; 39
Heb 13:14; 52, 551
```

James

Jas 1:7; 188 Jas 1:17; 217 Jas 2:20–24; 389

1 Peter

1Pe 1:10–12; 32 1Pe 1:11; 39 1Pe 1:18–19; 218, 525 1Pe 2:5; 482 1Pe 3:15–16; 142 1Pe 4:1–7; 53 1Pe 4:4; 510 1Pe 4:17; 142 1Pe 5:2–4; 397 1Pe 5:8; 326

2 Peter

2Pe 2:1; 361 2Pe 2:7; 240 2Pe 3:3–4; 318 2Pe 3:9–10; 198, 318, 327, 460 2Pe 3:11–14; 365

1 John

1Jn 1:7; 527 1Jn 1:8; 423 1Jn 2:4–6; 197 1Jn 2:18; 456 1Jn 3:2–6; 423, 510

```
1Jn 4:1-2; 179
```

2 John

2Jn 10-11; 442

Jude

Jude 8–16; 112 Jude 14–15; 127

Revelation

Re 1; 72

Re 1:10–20; 61

Re 1:13; 71

Re 2–3; 338

Re 2:1; 62

Re 2:2–5; 62–3

Re 2:5–7, 9, 13; 62

Re 3:1, 8, 15; 62

Re 3:16; 188

Re 4; 60-61

Re 5:5–6; 254

Re 5:10; 418

Re 6; 109

Re 6:10; 327, 459

Re 7:5–9; 39

Re 7:14; 181

Re 7:17; 401

Re 10; 73

Re 12:17; 456

Re 14:1; 138

Re 16:12; 452

Re 17–18; 339

Re 18; 326

Re 19:15; 73, 255, 280

Re 20:8; 454

Re 20:10; 327

Re 20:14–15; 280

Re 21–22; 294

```
Re 21; 454, 482–83, 506
```

Re 21:1–3; 409

Re 21:1; 337

Re 21:2; 548

Re 21:3; 191

Re 21:7; 549

Re 21:12, 14; 548

Re 21:22; 39, 549

Re 22; 30, 294, 482–83, 532

Re 22:7; 102

Re 22:15; 112

Re 22:19; 102

Subject Index

A | B | C | D | E | G | H | I | J | L | M | N | O | P | R | S | T | V | W

```
A
    Abraham, 196–97, 319, 384–85, 404, 408, 480, 550
    Adam, 69, 73, 79, 103, 157, 242, 346, 427 anti-exodus, 149, 151, 162 apocalyptic, 131-32
    Asherah, 131–32
B baptism, 95-96, 141, 422 blame-shifting, 123 blood, 291, 314, 316–17
C cherubim, 58–59, 147–48, 278 church, marks of, 64, 156-57 city, 294, 546-48, 551 civil rights movement, 93 clean and unclean, 416–18 corporate responsibility, 195–97, 239–40 covenant, 99–102, 111, 193, 196, 227, 265–66, 360, 396, 398, 404, 415, 422, 504 creation, 38, 59
D
    Daniel, 193-95, 345
    Day of the Lord, 118, 291-92, 364 divine warrior, 58, 65, 78, 88, 278 drama, 94, 163, 166
E
    Edom, 278, 324, 404-8
    Egypt, 91, 104, 132, 150, 212, 224, 229, 247, 260, 262, 301–3, 355–79
```

```
election, 68, 262–63, 266, 269, 408–10 evangelism, 73–75, 166–67 exile: Assyrian and Babylonian policy, 22; historical background, 18–23, learning to live in, 50– 53; stages of, 48–49
    exodus, 151, 270
    Ezekiel: authorship of book, 23–26; call of, 60, 78; difficulty of reading book, 17; dumbness of,
      38, 80, 384; psychological analysis of, 81
G
    God: abandonment of Jerusalem, 35, 152, 155; faithfulness of, 104; glory of, 56, 78, 80, 153, 492–94; justice of, 104, 235, 238, 281–83, 318, 384; name of, 418–19; presence of, 152–53, 155–56, 485–86; sovereignty of, 35–36, 68, 235, 489–90, 496–97, 551; wrath of, 103–4, 137–
      38, 197–98, 293–94, 309, 320
\mathbf{H}
    harvest, 73 heaven and hell, 124, 379 hell, 269, 281–82, 309
    Hezekiah, 20, 107, 171, 212, 303, 356 high places, 107, 269 holiness, 157, 438–39, 503–4 hope, 157
I
    idolatry, 111–14, 131–34, 138–39, 142, 184, 188–90, 211, 268 interpretation: allegorical, 26–28, 60; Christ-centered, 30–33; literal, 29
J
    Jesus: good shepherd, 400–401; new king, 231, 441–42; new temple, 156, 439–41, 481–82, 551;
      second Adam, 73, 351, 401
    Jonah, 60, 74
    Josiah, 107, 132
    judgment, 37, 58–62, 78, 98–100, 103–4, 115, 117–22, 136–38, 150, 269, 278, 285–90, 319–20, 327-28
L lament, 246–47, 253–54 law and grace, 295–96 life and death, 78–79, 240
```

```
Lincoln, Abraham, 61, 65
    Lord's Supper, 95–96, 220
    Lucifer, 348
M martyrdom, 459–61 missions, 74, 320 monarchy, 228-29, 231 mourning, 315-16, 318
N names, 153
    Nebuchadnezzar, 21, 147, 149, 162, 224–27, 276–78, 313, 357–58, 371, 376
    Noah, 193–95
0 oracles against nations, 325–26, 359–60 optimism and pessimism, 249
P perseverance, 85
    pictorial speech, 226, 234-35, 274, 305-8 pluralism, 110, 139-40 political miscalculation, 229-30
    postmodernism, 266-67, 386-87 preaching, 26-33, 280, 389-90 preservation, 85, 462 priestly case law, 235, 240, 286 problem of evil, 95, 241–42
R recognition formula, 108 remembering, 219 resurrection, 429, 431–33 rewards, 505–10, 549–51
S
```

```
Sabbath, 261, 518 sacraments, 95-96 sacrifices, 518-20, 524-27
    sanctification, 421–23
    Satan, 348
    Satan's strategies, 326, 338-39, 349-51, 362-64 sea, 337
    seeker services, 62, 94
    Sheol, 373–74, 376, 429 shame, 423-24, 451
    shepherds, 394-401
    sign-acts, 88-94, 98-100, 161-62, 275 sin: communicating reality of, 293, 308–9, 387–88; ugliness of, 36, 217–18
    Sodom, 147, 213-14, 240, 97, 319, 414 son of man, 71–73, 75, 86, 340 suffering, 202-4, 390-91, 460
    Sunday, 53
\mathbf{T}
    Tammuz, 132–3 temple, 107, 120, 131–36, 152–53, 437–41, 470–528, 544–45
    Tyre, 333–51, 357
V vine, 199–204, 223
W watchman, 78, 82, 84, 383
```

Author Index

A | B | C | D | E | F | G | H | I | J | K | L | M | N | O | P | R | S | T | U | V | W | Y | Z

A

```
Alexander, R. H. 452
    Allen, L. C. 46, 58, 89–90, 93, 106–7, 109, 147, 149–51, 162, 172, 195, 200, 213, 223, 238, 246, 248, 262, 274–76, 287–88, 301, 304–5, 314, 324, 334, 344, 355, 358–59, 372, 382, 385, 395, 406, 414, 435, 447, 449, 474, 476, 541
    Alstyne, F. van 220
    Ambrose 452
    Anbar, M. 288
    Anderson, L. 399
    Andrew, M. E. 85
    Augustine 452
B
    Belleville, L. L. 422
    Bloch-Smith, E. 490
    Block, D. I. 21, 25, 47, 80, 98, 100, 107, 110, 119–20, 132–34, 147, 162, 173, 195, 246–68, 260, 264, 276, 313–16, 323, 345, 347, 355, 358–59, 376, 395, 405, 408, 414, 423, 426, 446–47, 449, 456, 472, 503, 518, 522, 526, 542, 545
    Bloesch, D. 177
    Bly, R. W 483
    Boadt, L. 106, 199, 372, 374
    Bock, D. L. 508
    Bodi, D. 110
    Bork, R. 534
    Boston, T. 125, 340, 387
    Braun, R. L. 57
    Brenner, A. 306
    Bright, J. 21, 23
    Bruce, F. F. 178
    Bruggemann, W. 226
    Burrelli, R. 108
```

```
\mathbf{C}
```

D

```
Calvin, J. 46, 74, 89, 115, 122, 141, 156, 158, 189, 219
Campbell, A. V. 397
Candlish, R. S. 137
Carley, K. 430
Cassidy, A. 349
Chapell, B. 72
Clapp, R. 265
Clements, R. E. 57, 99, 306, 382, 404
Clifford, R. J. 290, 449, 532
Clowney, E. P. 31–32, 361, 481, 483
Cogan, M. 212, 227
Colson, C. C. 350
Conforti, J. 507, 509
Conn, H. M. 166
Cook, S. L. 455
Cooke, G. A. 46, 110, 149, 161–62, 277, 334
Corrie, J. 267
Coupland, D. 386
Covey, S. 114
Cowper, W. 310
Craigie, P. C. 478
Dallimore, A. 94
Darr, K. P. 479, 533
Davis, D. R. 533
Davis, E. F. 80
Day, J. 193, 345, 355, 530
Dever, W. G. 107
DeVries, S. J. 304
Dillard, R. B. 530
Donne, J. 496
Drijvers, H. J. W. 107
Duguid, I. M. 24, 57, 121, 133, 136, 148, 174, 183, 247, 259, 279, 286, 363, 395–96, 428, 448, 475, 490, 500–503, 519, 523, 548
Duke, R. K. 134, 502
Dumbrell, W. J. 71
Dürr, L. 394
```

```
Ebach, J. H. 490, 548
    Edwards, J. 93
    Egner, D. 452
    Eichrodt, W. 69, 149, 305
    Elliot, J. 28, 86
    Ellison, H. L. 172, 454
    Eph'al, I. 173
    Eskenazi, T. C. 48
    Exum, J. C. 306
F
    Fairbairn, P. 89, 149, 414
    Feinberg, C. L. 452, 479, 521–22
    Flavel, J. 340
    Frame, J. 439
    Freedy, K. S. 372
    Friebel, K. G. 89
G
    Gaebelein, A. C. 452
    Galambush, J. 209, 211, 301–2, 307
    Galli, M. 327
    Garscha, J. 24
    Gerstner, J. 282
    Gesenius, W. 452
    Geyer, J. B. 194
    Gorman, F. H. Jr. 489
    Gosse, B. 404
    Gowan, D. E. 358
    Greenberg, M. 24–25, 59, 68, 79–80, 89–90, 118–19, 121, 130, 136, 147, 149, 151, 161–62, 171, 173, 175, 183–85, 194, 199, 201, 210, 213–15, 225, 236–37, 248–49, 260, 263, 275, 289, 304, 313, 315, 324, 345–46, 357–59, 385, 396, 416, 429, 435, 476–77, 500, 517, 522
    Greenhill, W. 26, 46, 59, 75, 452
    Gregory the Great 26, 60
    Greidanus, S. 32
    Grenz, S. 387
    Guinness, O. 349
```

```
Gutiérrez, G. 270
    Gwaltney, W. C. 19
H
    Halperin, D. 81, 131, 267
    Hals, R. M. 247
    Haran, M. 475, 517
    Harrelson, W. 261
    Heider, G. C. 262
    Heine, H. 122
    Held, M. 247
    Hengstenberg, E. W. 70, 397
    Herodotus 447
    Herrmann, J. 170
    Heschel, A. 242
    Hillers, D. R. 101
    Himmelfarb, G. 293
    Hoekema, A. 506
    Hoffmeier, J. K. 371
    Hölscher, G. 11
    Horbury, W. 184
    Hullinger, J. M. 521
    Hunter, K. R. 400
I
    Ironside, H. A. 452, 479
J
    Jacobsen, T. 133
    Jenson, P. P. 524
    Jerome 17, 141
    Johnston, P. S. 373
    Jones, G. H. 530
    Jones, P. R. 495
    Josephus 358
    Joyce, P. M. 184, 237–38
```

```
Kaiser, O. 226
    Keil, C. F. 151, 453
    Keller, T. J. 535
    Kellermann, D. 542
    King, E. G. 515
    Klein, R. W. 395
    Kline, M. G. 102–3
    Körtner, U. 458
    Kramp, J. 461
    Krüger, T. 162
    Kuiper, R. B. 295
    Kushner, H. 164, 241
L
    Laato, A. 237
    Lampe, G. W. H. 166
    Lang, B. 92–93
    Lasch, C. 250
    Lemke, W. E. 394
    Levenson, J. D. 226, 290, 395, 426, 471, 544, 546
    Levey, S. H. 523
    Levine, B. A. 492
    Lewis, C. S. 115, 198, 267, 282, 379, 433, 508
    Lewis, T. J. 490
    Lind, M. 292, 356, 404, 414, 435, 448, 451
    Lindsey, H. 452
    Lloyd-Jones, D. M. 294, 550
    Long, B. O. 132
    Longman, T. III 530
    Lovelace, R. F. 34, 142
    Luther, M. 320
M
    Macholz, G. Ch. 542, 545, 548
    Malul, M. 210
    Margalit, B. 194
    Marshall, I. H. 96
    Mason, C. E. Jr. 452
    Mathewes-Green, F. 269
```

```
Matties, G. H. 235, 239
Maudlin, M. G. 176
McCarthy, D. J. 519
McCartney, D. G. 95, 241
McConville, J. G. 153, 239, 491
McGinn, B. 452
McGregor, J. 387
McKane, W. 222
Mackay, C. M. 517, 545
McMahon, G. 209
Mettinger, T. N. D. 520
Meyers, C. 437
Milgrom, J. 290, 414, 417, 477, 491–92, 500–501, 503
Millard, A. R. 303
Miller, C. J. 34
Miller, J. E. 46
Moberly, R. W. L. 418
Moran, W. 277
Moynihan, D. P. 293
Murray, J. 26, 421
Neiman, D. 490
Newbigin, L. 113
Newton, J. 34, 338, 510
Niditch, S. 479
Niebuhr, H. R. 137
O'Connor, F. 218
Oded, B. 22
Odell, M. S. 46, 70, 78, 82
Oden, T. C. 399
Oesterly, W. O. E. 108
Old, H. O. 34
Orelli, C. von 46
Ortiz, G. 457
Overholt, T. 148
Owen, R. 139, 484
```

N

0

```
Perkins, W. 295
    Peterson, E. 72, 340, 399–400
    Pfafflin, U. 51
    Phillips, A. 184
    Piper, J. 75, 419
    Pleins, J. D. 396
    Ploeg, J. P. M. vander 148
    Postman, N. 94
    Powlison, D. 188
    Poythress, V. 307, 398
    Price, J. D. 448
R
    Rad, G. von 78, 92
    Redford, D. 372
    Reid, J. K. S. 441
    Renz, T. 106, 426
    Reventlow, H. G. 99, 277, 286
    Richardson, D. 306
    Ricoeur, P. 301
    Robertson, O. P. 102
    Roof, W. C. 176, 265
    Rosenberg, A. J. 471
    Roux, M. 457
    Ruiz, J-P. 51
    Ryken, L. 111
    Ryrie, C. C. 29
S
    Saint, S. 410
    Saggs, H. W. F. 174
    Sasson, J. M. 375
    Schaeffer, F. 108, 495
    Schmidt, M. 132
    Scholl, D. G. 201
    Schottroff, W. 287
    Schuller, R. 423
```

```
Schuringa, H. D. 94
    Scofield, C. I. 452, 521
    Sedlmeier, F. 260
    Skinner, J. 69, 89, 325, 504
    Smith, D. L. 183, 506
    Snodgrass, K. 440
    Spafford, H. 390
    Speiser, E. A. 453
    Sproul, R. C. 265
    Spurgeon, C. H. 27, 215, 244, 295
    Stacey, W. D. 92
    Stevenson, K. R. 472, 474–76, 489–90, 501, 503, 515, 517, 541, 544
    Strom, M. R. 349
    Stuart, D. 46, 91, 215, 323, 382, 406, 474, 522
T
    Tada, J. E. 461
    Talmon, S. 121, 163, 289
    Tapia, A. 267
    Taylor, J. B. 69, 89, 130, 383, 523
    Tertullian 137, 141, 189
    Thomas, D. 80, 478, 522
    Tromp, N. 80
    Tsevat, M. 261
    Tuell, S. 474, 522, 542
    Turner, H. 438
U
    Ussishkin, D. 173
V
    VanGemeren, W. 522
    Vaughn, P. H. 107
    Vaux, R. de 525
    Vawter, B. 136, 162, 171
    Volf, M. 52
    Vos, G. 493
```

Schult, H. 99

W

```
Wagner, C. P. 251
    Wahl, H-M. 194
    Weinfeld, M. 235, 261, 505
    Welch, E. T. 188, 423
    Wellhausen, J. 501
    Wenham, G. J. 111, 215, 313, 346, 530
    Wesley, C. 187, 411, 433
    Wevers, J. 58, 148–49, 274
    Whitefield, G. 190
    Wilken, R. L. 452, 550
    Williamson, H. G. M. 153, 270
    Willimon, W. H. 141
    Willmes, B. 395
    Wilson, R. R. 58, 80
    Winston, D. 140
    Wiseman, D. J. 277
    Woiwode, L. 218
    Wright, C. J. H. 398
Y
    Yadin, Y. 474
    Yamauchi, E. 453
    Yancey, P. 460
    Yarbrough, R. 178
    York, A. D. 46
    Young, E. J. 31
    Younger, K. L. Jr. 22
Z
    Zevit, Z. 107
    Zimmerli, W. 79–80, 89, 92–93, 106, 108–9, 118, 131, 148–49, 175, 210–11, 235, 240, 247, 261, 263, 276–77, 286–88, 305, 335, 372, 382, 394–95, 414, 416, 429, 435, 436, 447, 449, 451, 471, 474–76, 492, 503, 519, 531–32, 545
```

Notes

- 1. Jerome, Ep. ad Paulinam, 8.
- 2. b. hag. 13a.
- 3. b. šabb. 13b.
- 4. b. Menah. 45a.
- 5. On the history of the Assyrian empire, see William C. Gwaltney Jr., "Assyrians," in Peoples of the Old Testament World, ed. A. J. Hoerth, G. L. Mattingly, and E. M. Yamauchi (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994), 77–106.
- 6. James B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts, 2d ed. (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1955), 288.
- 7. Daniel I. Block, Ezekiel 1–24 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 3.
- 8. John Bright, A History of Israel, 3d ed. (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981), 327.
- ANET, 283, 288. On the Assyrian deportations, see Bustenai Oded, Mass Deportations and Deportees in the Neo-Assyrian Empire (Wiesbaden: L. Reichert, 1979), and K. Lawson Younger Jr., "The Deportations of the Israelites," JBL 117 (1998): 201–27.
- 10. Bright, A History of Israel, 344-45.
- 11. BZAW 39; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1924).
- 12. For an evaluation of these yardsticks of originality, see Moshe Greenberg, "What Are Valid Criteria for Determining Inauthentic Matter in Ezekiel?" in Ezekiel and His Book: Textual and Literary Criticism and Their Interrelation, ed. J. Lust (BETL 74; Leuven: Leuven Univ. Press, 1986), 123–35.
- 13. So Jörg Garscha, Studien zum Ezechielbuch (Bern: Herbert Lang, 1974), 15.
- 14. See my Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 72–74.
- 15. Moshe Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20 (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983), 27. For an example of Greenberg's critique of traditional critical approaches to the book, see "Note on Criteria of Authenticity: The Sidon Oracle As an Example," Ezekiel 21–37 (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1997), 597–99.
- 16. See Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 22.
- 17. See The Westminster Confession of Faith, I.4 and I.5. See John Murray, "The Attestation of Scripture," in P. Woolley, ed., The Infallible Word, 3d ed. (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1967), 1–54.
- 18. The Homilies of Gregory the Great on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, trans. T. Gray (Etna, Calif.: Center for Traditionalist Orthodox Studies, 1990), 179–85.
- 19. William Greenhill, An Exposition of Ezekiel (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1994 reprint), 780.
- 20. Spurgeon, Lectures to My Students (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1972 reprint), 97.
- 21. As Spurgeon does in his sermon on Ezekiel 47:5, "Waters to Swim in," published in The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit: Sermons Preached and Revised in 1872, vol. 18 (Pasadena, Tex.: Pilgrim, 1971 reprint), 313–24. By no means all of his sermons on the book of Ezekiel are allegorical, however.
- 22. The Journals of Jim Elliot (Old Tappan, N.J.: Revell, 1978), 39–40.
- 23. Dispensationalism Today (Chicago: Moody, 1986), 86.
- 24. Ibid., 87.
- 25. Edward J. Young, My Servants the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), 46-54.
- 26. See Edmund P. Clowney, Preaching and Biblical Theology (Nutley, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1975), 76.
- 27. Edmund P. Clowney, "Preaching Christ From All the Scriptures," in S.T. Logan, ed., The Preacher and Preaching (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1986), 164. See also Bryan Chapell, Christ-Centered Preaching: Redeeming the Expository Sermon (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994), 272; Sidney Greidanus, The Modern Preacher and the Ancient Text: Interpreting and Preaching Biblical Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988), 118–20.
- 28. Chapell, Christ-Centered Preaching, 272.
- 29. See John Newton, "On the Inefficacy of Knowledge," in The Works of John Newton (Carlisle, Pa.: Banner of Truth, 1985 reprint), 1:245–53.
- 30. On the power of the gospel to change lives, see C. John Miller, Outgrowing the Ingrown Church (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986), 120–34. Similarly, Richard F. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life: An Evangelical Theology of Renewal (Downer's Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1979), 95–144.
- 31. See Hughes Oliphant Old, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church. Volume 1: The Biblical Period (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 189.

- 1. Douglas Stuart, Ezekiel (Dallas, Tex.: Word, 1988), 29; A. D. York, "Ezekiel 1: Inaugural and Restoration Visions?" VT 27 (1977): 82–98.
- 2. See George A. Cooke, Ezekiel (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936), 7. In the seventeenth century, this view was advocated by William Greenhill, An Exposition of Ezekiel (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1994 reprint), 9.
- 3. So also John Calvin, Ezekiel I, trans. D. Foxgrover and D. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 14.
- 4. For this view, see Claus von Orelli, Das Buch Ezechiel und die zwölf kleinen Propheten, 2d ed. (Munich: Beek, 1896).
- 5. J. E. Miller, "The 'Thirtieth Year' of Ezekiel 1.1," RB 99 (1992): 499–503; Margaret S. Odell, "You Are What You Eat: Ezekiel and the Scroll," JBL 117 (1998): 229–48; Leslie C. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19 (WBC 28; Dallas, Tex.: Word, 1994), 21; Joseph Blenkinsopp, Ezekiel (Interpretation; Louisville: John Knox, 1990), 16; Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 82.
- 6. On 'elōhîm as an appellative ("divinity") in this phrase rather than a proper noun, see Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 85.
- 7. "Exile and Dreams of Return," CurrTM 18 (1990): 192.
- 8. Ibid., 197.
- 9. Ibid., 198.
- 10. These causes of the sense of exile, while perhaps new to some of us, have been familiar to our brothers and sisters in the African-American and Hispanic-American community for generations. See Jean-Pierre Ruiz, "Exile History and Hope: A Hispanic Reading of Ezekiel 20," The Bible Today 35 (1997): 106–13.
- 11. See Ursula Pfafflin, "Displacement and the Yearning for Holding Environments: Visions in Feminist Pastoral Psychology and Theology," Journal of Pastoral Care 49 (1995): 391.
- 12. "An American Tune," words and music by Paul Simon; © 1973 Paul Simon (BMI).
- 13. Cited by Miroslav Volf in "Allegiance and Rebellion," The Christian Century 114 (1997): 633.

- 1. Notice the significance of "rest" as a precondition for building the temple in Deut. 12:10; 2 Sam. 7:1; 1 Chron. 22:9. See Roddy L. Braun, 1 Chronicles (WBC 14; Waco, Tex.: Word, 1986), 224–25.
- 2. Ronald E. Clements, Isaiah and the Deliverance of Jerusalem (JSOTS 13; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980), 98. Clements points to this belief as a significant factor in the "confident, but ill-founded way in which the kings of Judah reacted to the constraints of outside political pressure . . . and . . . were guilty of the most crass and reckless political misjudgments."
- 3. See Iain Duguid, "Ezekiel," Dictionary of Biblical Imagery, ed. Leland Ryken, James C. Wilhoit, and Tremper Longman III (Downer's Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998), 256–57.
- 4. Robert R. Wilson, "Prophecy in Crisis: The Call of Ezekiel," Int 38 (1984): 125.
- 5. These wheels intersect with one another at right angles to enable the chariot to move in any direction without turning (so v. 17). See John W. Wevers, Ezekiel (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982), 46.
- 6. See "Chariot," DBI, 139.
- 7. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 25.
- 8. This was recognized already by the rabbis, who explained: "Four kinds of proud beings were created in the world: the proudest of all—man; of birds—the eagle; of domestic animals—the bull; of wild animals—the lion; and all of them are stationed beneath the chariot of the Holy One" (Exod. Rab. 23.13). See Moshe Greenberg, "Ezekiel's Vision: Literary and Iconographic Aspects," in History, Historiography and Interpretation: Studies in Biblical and Cuneiform Literature, ed. H. Tadmor and M. Weinfeld (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1983), 165.
- 9. The idea of God's setting his bow in the clouds is unique to these two passages.
- 10. For example, William Greenhill adduces from the text that "each one went straight ahead; they did not turn as they moved" (Ezek. 1:9), the application that Christians ought to mind their own business and not meddle in the affairs of others (Ezekiel, 39). Similarly, Gregory the Great identified the four faces of the living creatures with the four Evangelists (Homilies on the Book of Ezekiel, 4.1). In this, he may have been influenced by the earlier identification of the four (separate) living creatures of Rev. 4 with the gospel writers by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 3.11.8) and Victorinus (Comm. in Apoc. 4.3–4). In each case, the application is arbitrary rather than growing out of an understanding of the text in its original context.
- 11. Other images from Ezek. 1 appear in the vision of the heavenly throne room in Rev. 4: a throne on a surface like crystal, four living creatures covered with eyes, and partaking of the likeness of a lion, an eagle, an ox, and a human being. Yet along with the similarities there are also differences. The "expanse" (rāqîa') becomes a "sea of glass," the living creatures now each have the likeness of one kind of animal instead of each having the faces of all four, and now they have six wings (like Isaiah's seraphim) instead of four. The eyes have moved from the wheels (which have disappeared) onto the living creatures themselves.
- 12. "The Seeker Service at Fair Haven," Reformed Worship 23 (1992): 10.

- 1. This identification of Israel with the paradigm of rebellion, the "nations" (gôyim; e.g., Ps. 2:1), probably explains the unexpected plural here.
- 2. Compare with the opening chapter of Hosea, where Israel has become "Not my people" ($l\bar{o}$ -'ammî, Hos. 1:9). Similarly, in Ex. 32:7–14, after the sin with the golden calf, God sends Moses back to "your people, whom you brought up out of Egypt" (v. 7, reflecting Israel's self-identification in v. 1); the resolution to the crisis is not reached until the Lord relents and does not bring the threatened disaster upon "his people" (v. 14).
- 3. Moshe Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20 (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983), 62.
- 4. "'The primary sense of mārad is refuse allegiance to, rise up against, a sovereign'; its antonym is ābad 'serve, be subject to'" (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 63).
- 5. There is a play on the prophet's name here, for Ezekiel means "God strengthens." See John B. Taylor, Ezekiel (TOTC; Downer's Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1969), 66.
- 6. Thus John Skinner would translate ben-ādām simply by "member of the human race," arguing that "it expresses the infinite contrast between the heavenly and the earthly, between the glorious Being who speaks from the throne and the frail creature who needs to be supernaturally strengthened before he can stand upright in the attitude of service" (The Book of Ezekiel [The Expositor's Bible; New York: Armstrong & Son, 1895], 44).
- 7. "What the entire people should achieve is to be realized in the one son of man who is their representative" (Walther Eichrodt, Ezekiel, trans. C. Quin [OTL; London: SCM, 1970], 64). For the connection between Ezek. 37 and Gen. 2:7, see Blenkinsopp, Ezekiel, 173.
- 8. Compare Ezek. 36:26–27.
- 9. This may be the reason why the metaphor of Jer. 15:16 has become a concrete experience for Ezekiel.
- Ernst W. Hengstenberg, The Prophecies of Ezekiel Elucidated, trans. A. C. & J. G. Murphy (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1874), 37.
- 11. The Hebrew word translated "overwhelmed" (mašmîm) comes from the root šāmam, which occurs frequently throughout Ezekiel in the sense of "devastate, ravage, make desolate."
- 12. Odell, "Ezekiel and the Scroll," 244.
- 13. William J. Dumbrell, "Spirit and Kingdom of God in the Old Testament," Reformed Theological Review 33 (1974): 1–10.
- 14. See Bruce Chilton, "The Son of Man—Who Was He?" Bible Review 12 (1996): 34-46.
- 15. Reversed Thunder (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988), 30.
- 16. Ezekiel I, 61.
- 17. John Piper, Let the Nations Be Glad! The Supremacy of God in Missions (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993), 14-15.
- 18. Exposition of Ezekiel, 79.

- 1. Odell, "Ezekiel and the Scroll," 231.
- 2. So Gerhard von Rad, Old Testament Theology, 2 vols. (New York: Harper, 1962, 1965), 2:231.
- 3. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 95.
- 4. On the concepts of "life" and "death," see Walther Zimmerli, "'Leben' und 'Tod' im Buche des Propheten Ezechiel," ThZ 13 (1957): 494–508.
- 5. Compare 2 Sam. 4:11–13. See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 85.
- 6. Nicholas Tromp, "The Paradox of Ezekiel's Prophetic Mission: Towards a Semiotic Approach of Ezekiel 3:22–27," in Ezekiel and His Book: Textual and Literary Criticism and Their Interrelation, ed. J. Lust (BETL 74; Leuven: Leuven Univ. Press, 1986), 209.
- 7. Derek Thomas, God Strengthens: Ezekiel Simply Explained (Welwyn Commentary Series; Darlington: Evangelical Press, 1993), 40.
- 8. Commentators have disagreed over whether the dumbness allows intermittent speech at the divine command (so Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 102) or is total until its lifting at the fall of Jerusalem, foretold in Ezek. 24:27 (so Walther Zimmerli, Ezekiel, trans. R. E. Clements, 2 vols. [Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979], 1:160). At issue is the question of whether the "when I speak to you" of 3:27 has a repetitive sense ("whenever") or a momentary sense ("at the time when"). In favor of Greenberg's view is the parallel construction in 3:18, which undeniably has an iterative sense.

- 9. Ellen F. Davis comments: "Ezekiel must fall 'silent' and let the scroll which he has swallowed speak through him" (Swallowing the Scroll: Textuality and the Dynamics of Discourse in Ezekiel's Prophecy [JSOTS 78; Sheffield: Almond, 1989], 52).
- 10. For the evidence for the môkîaḥ as an arbitrator or mediator between the two parties involved in a legal case, see Robert R. Wilson, "An Interpretation of Ezekiel's Dumbness," VT 22 (1972): 99–101. So also Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 157.
- 11. Systematic Theology, 4th ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1941), 361.
- 12. See, for instance, Gen. 20:7, where it is the fact that Abraham is a prophet that qualifies him to intercede on Abimelech's behalf.
- 13. David Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (State College, Pa.: Pennsylvania State Univ., Press, 1993).
- 14. Odell, "Ezekiel and the Scroll," 245.
- 15. Maurice E. Andrew, Responsibility and Restoration: The Course of the Book of Ezekiel (Dunedin: Univ. of Otago Press, 1985), 26.
- 16. The Journals of Jim Elliot (Old Tappan, N.J.: Revell, 1978), 174.

- 1. According to Kurt Galling, ancient Near Eastern bricks had dimensions ranging from 6" to 13–1/2" wide and 10" to 24" long ("Ziegel," Biblisches Reallexikon, ed. K. Galling, 2d ed. [Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr, 1977], 364).
- 2. Compare the comments on Ezekiel's dumbness above.
- 3. At least to understand, though not to perform! For this reason, many older interpreters viewed it as a purely visionary action that was never actually performed (e.g., Calvin, Ezekiel I, 116; Skinner, Ezekiel, 65; Patrick Fairbairn, An Exposition of Ezekiel [Grand Rapids: Sovereign Grace, 1971 reprint], 25). More recent commentators, stressing the public nature of sign-acts, tend to play down the difficulty by imagining the prophet as performing it on a part-time basis (e.g., Taylor, Ezekiel, 81; Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 67; Kelvin G. Friebel, Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's Sign-Acts: Their Meaning and Function As Nonverbal Communication and Rhetoric [Ph.D. diss.; Madison: Univ. of Wisconsin, 1989], 546).
- 4. Ezekiel 1–20, 106.
- 5. This is perhaps what explains the reading of 190 years instead of 390 years found in the LXX. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:167.
- 6. For an example, see Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 105.
- 7. The exact dates are variously rendered, depending on whether you start from the exile of 598 B.C. or that of 586 B.C.; however, the import is clear.
- 8. Cf. Ezek. 25:3; see Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 68.
- 9. Compare the same period predicted for the exile of the Egyptians in Ezek. 29:12–13.
- 10. Compare the similar ideas expressed in Ezek. 20:35–36.
- 11. Stuart, Ezekiel, 58.
- 12. The process by which significant actions in the present can create the future by "pre-enacting" it. An example would be the voodoo practice of sticking pins into a model of a person in the belief that thereby real hurt will be caused to the person concerned.
- 13. For the former see von Rad, Old Testament Theology, 2:96–97; Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:156; for the latter, Bernhard Lang, "Street Theater, Raising the Dead, and the Zoroastrian Connection in Ezekiel's Prophecy," in Ezekiel and His Book, 305.
- 14. W. David Stacey has objected that many of the prophetic sign-acts took place in private; for instance, Ezekiel's eating of the scroll (Prophetic Drama in the Old Testament [London: Epworth, 1990], 265). However, the public recounting of the sign-act performed in private immediately makes it a public act.
- 15. Ezekiel 1–19, 66.
- 16. For this use of "affections," see Jonathan Edwards, A Treatise on the Religious Affections (Carlisle, Pa.: Banner of Truth, 1986 reprint), 25.
- 17. Westminster Confession of Faith, 27.1
- 18. So Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:28.
- 19. See Lang's comments on the ability of sign-acts to gain a hearing for a potentially unpopular message ("Street Theater," 301).
- 20. Arnold Dallimore, The Life of George Whitefield (Westchester, Ill.: Cornerstone, 1980), 2:388.
- 21. Neil Postman, Amusing Ourselves to Death (New York: Viking Penguin, 1985), 8.
- 22. H. David Schuringa, Hearing the Word in a Visual Age (Ph.D. diss., Kampen, 1995), 220-32.
- 23. Dan G. McCartney, Why Does It Have to Hurt? The Meaning of Christian Suffering (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1998), 60.

24. Twice in full (Acts 10:10–16; 11:5–10) and once in summary 15:7–9 (I. Howard Marshall, Acts [TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980], 181).

- 1. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 193.
- 2. Henning G. Reventlow, Wächter über Israel: Ezechiel und seine Tradition (BZAW 82; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1962), 25–26.
- 3. It is tempting to read Ezekiel's iron pan against the background of Lev. 26:19, which speaks of the heavens becoming like iron to the covenant breakers. Though in the original context in Leviticus the iron heavens are joined to earth of brass, suggesting that drought is the curse intended, Ezekiel may have taken up the imagery and reapplied it in concrete form, much as he does with Isaiah's hired razor, to symbolize the closing of the lines of communication between humankind and God
- 4. In both cases lit., "breaking the staff of bread." For an explanation of this phrase in terms of the practice of carrying ringshaped loaves on a pole, see H. Schult, "Marginalie zum 'Stab des Brotes," ZDPV 87 (1971): 206–8.
- 5. Ronald E. Clements, God and Temple (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1965), 49–50.
- 6. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 217.
- 7. For a brief analysis of the Hittite treaty form, see Delbert R. Hillers, Covenant: The History of a Biblical Idea (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1969), 27–39.
- 8. 8. O. Palmer Robertson, The Christ of the Covenants (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1980), 271–300.
- 9. Though the original reference is only to the book of Revelation, it forms a fitting conclusion to the New Testament and the Bible as a whole. See Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, 2d ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975), 37.
- 10. Meredith G. Kline, Kingdom Prologue (priv. publ., 1991), 28.

- 1. Note the explicit connection between Ezek. 5:17, "I will bring the sword against you," and 6:3, "I am about to bring a sword against you" (Thomas Renz, The Rhetorical Function of the Book of Ezekiel [Ph.D. diss., Cheltenham and Gloucester College/Univ. of Bristol, 1997], 52).
- 2. See Lawrence Boadt, "Rhetorical Strategies in Ezekiel's Oracles of Judgment," in Ezekiel and His Book, 188.
- 3. So Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 86.
- 4. Cf. Isa. 14:25; 65:9. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:185.
- 5. Patrick H. Vaughn, The Meaning of 'bāmâ' in the Old Testament: A Study of Etymological, Textual and Archaeological Evidence (SOTSMS 3; London: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1974), 29–55.
- 6. Most English translations render this word as "incense altars." However, evidence from an Aramaic temple foundation inscription that equates hmn' with naos suggests that they should rather be understood as sanctuaries of some kind. See H. J. W. Drijvers, "Aramaic hmn' and Hebrew hmn: Their Meaning and Root," JSS 33 (1988): 174; Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 225–26.
- 7. See 2 Kings 23:4–7. Those ministering at the high places of Josiah's day apparently included Yahwistic priests ($k\bar{o}h^anim$; 23:9) as well as pagan priests ($k^em\bar{a}rim$; 23:5), so there was evidently syncretism as well as outright pagan idolatry. Recent archaeological discoveries from the eighth century B.C. also support the picture of syncretistic worship. On these, see William G. Dever, "Asherah, Consort of Yahweh? New Evidence From Kuntillet 'Ajrûd," BASOR 255 (1984): 21–37, and Ziony Zevit, "The Khirbet el-Qôm Inscription Mentioning a Goddess," BASOR 255 (1984): 39–47.
- 8. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 87.
- 9. See W. O. E. Oesterley, The Sacred Dance: A Study in Comparative Folklore (Cambridge: Cambridge. Univ. Press, 1923), 88; Robert Burrelli, "Dance and Related Expressions of Worship" (unpub. Th.M. thesis; Dallas: Dallas Theological Seminary), 16. A similar ritual seems to have developed as part of the later Lulab Festival at the Feast of Tabernacles (m. Sukka 4:5).
- 10. Again, an element of heightening from the previous chapter, where it occurs only once (Ezek. 5:13).
- 11. See Walther Zimmerli, "The Recognition of God According to the Book of Ezekiel," in I Am Yahweh, ed. W. Brueggemann, trans. D. Stuart (Atlanta: John Knox, 1982), 29–98.
- 12. Cf. the title of one of his books, He Is There and He Is Not Silent (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1972).
- 13. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:189.

- 14. The Hebrew of Ezek. 6:9 is difficult; various suggestions have been made to emend the text to read, "I have broken their adulterous heart and eyes," rather than the MT, "I have been broken [by?] their adulterous heart and eyes" (see Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 83). Perhaps the difficulty has been caused by an attempt to link this verse with the destruction of vv. 4, 6, so that the Lord is in effect saying, "I have been broken [nišbartî = grieved] by the judgment necessary to break their adultery in which their altars will be broken [nišberû; v. 6]"; as we would put it, "This is hurting me as much as it is hurting you."
- 15. Reading "Riblah" for MT "Diblah"—the consonants "r" and "d" were easily confused in Hebrew. Riblah is a city in the Syrian territory of Hamath, north of Israel. It is not the normal northern boundary of Israel, which was at Lebo Hamath (Ezek. 47:16; 48:1); it was perhaps chosen because of its associations with the exiling of Jehoahaz after Josiah's defeat and death (2 Kings 23:33), which made it a suitable place of judgment (Cooke, Ezekiel, 73).
- 16. Daniel Bodi, "Les gillûlîm chez Ézéchiel et dans l'Ancien Testament, et les différentes pratiques cultuelles associées à ce terme," RB 100 (1993): 481–510.
- 17. Block uses graphic terminology in Ezekiel 1–24, 226.
- 18. Gordon J. Wenham, "The Religion of the Patriarchs," in Essays on the Patriarchal Narratives, ed. A. R. Millard and D. J. Wiseman (Leicester: InterVarsity, 1980), 184.
- 19. The tendency to view one's country as an elect nation (or worse, the elect nation) is an unfortunate tendency within Puritan thought in general (see Leland Ryken, Worldly Saints: The Puritans As They Really Were [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986], 198). The sense of unique destiny was amplified in the American context by the circumstances behind the founding of the New England colonies, such that they viewed themselves as "a city set upon an hill . . . a people in covenant with God." From there, the idea of "manifest destiny" spread more widely into the American consciousness, along with other (more positive) aspects of Puritan thought. The notion of national covenants with God is also found in certain strands of British, and especially Scottish, theological thought, particularly among those strongly influenced by the Puritans.
- 20. "Son of a bitch" retains the canine reference but has perhaps become too commonplace an insult in general society. However, if you translate it into the context of the pulpit, its shocking force is perhaps still present.
- 21. Lesslie Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989), 15-16.
- 22. Stephen Covey lists a number of possible "personal centers" that can be helpful both in diagnosing personal idolatries and in helping unchurched people understand the concept of idolatry (The Seven Habits of Highly Effective People [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989], 118–25). Covey's answer to these "personal centers" is a life that is "principle centered," and he goes on to advise on how to write a mission statement that will clarify one's own principles. From a Christian perspective, this may well end up merely replacing one "ineffective" idolatry with a more "effective" one, that of "principles." Any center other than the true and living God, who has revealed himself in the Scriptures, is idolatry. Of course, assisting people to manufacture effective idolatries sells books.
- 23. The Weight of Glory and Other Addresses (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1965), 1–2.
- 24. Ezekiel I, 156.

- 1. Ezekiel 1–20, 161. For that reason, this translation is to be preferred to that of the NIV: "four corners of the land."
- 2. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:204.
- 3. This translation of $s^e p \bar{t} r \hat{a}$ is widely accepted by commentators; however, it is only "a guess based on the context" (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 148). Block prefers the translation, "The leash has gone forth," seeing $s^e p \bar{t} r \hat{a}$ as a reference to the chains in which Judah will be led into captivity (Ezekiel 1–24, 252, 254).
- 4. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20, 158.
- 5. Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 146.
- 6. This word often has military connotations (BDB, 242c).
- 7. The Hebrew reads lit., "Every knee will go (or flow) water," which the NIV, along with most other English versions, renders as "every knee will become as weak as water." However, most modern commentators understand "water" as urine in this context, a view that goes back to the LXX. The intended referent is not loss of strength but rather loss of bladder control. For the ancient Near Eastern comparative evidence, see Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 152.
- 8. The phrase 'am hā'āreş can either cover a rather general group of people or, as here, a specific political grouping closely linked to the Davidic monarchy. See Shemaryahu Talmon, "The Judean hā'āreş in Historical Perspective," in King, Cult and Calendar in Ancient Israel: Collected Studies (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1986), 68–78.
- 9. The balance between these two triads suggests that there is no reason to collapse the two references to king (melek) and prince ($n\bar{a}s'\hat{i}$) into a single person. Although Ezekiel frequently uses $n\bar{a}s'\hat{i}$ to refer to the reigning monarch, that preference is not absolute. For a defense of the present text, see Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 21.

- 10. The quotation is attributed to the nineteenth-century German author, Heinrich Heine.
- 11. The language is that of The Book of Common Prayer, "Collect for Communion."
- 12. Ezekiel I, 188.
- 13. New York: MacMillan, 1946.
- 14. For an extended example of how this can be done, see Thomas Boston's classic Human Nature in Its Fourfold State (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1964 reprint). This book describes the original situation of the human race in the state of innocence before the Fall, the post-Fall situation apart from Christ, the Christian's present situation in this world, and finally a description of one's final state in heaven or hell. The material originated as sermons that were preached to a rural community in eighteenth-century Scotland and therefore represents a pastorally motivated rather than a doctrinally motivated presentation.

- 1. The period is understood as completed by including the 40 days within the 390 or assuming an intercalatory month (Taylor, Ezekiel, 80); however, there seems no objection to the vision taking place within the period of the sign-act (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 166).
- 2. According to Jer. 28, in the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign the prophet Hananiah had declared that within two years the Babylonian yoke would be broken, while the captives and the temple treasures would be returned. If this oracle was known among the exiles, the fact that the clock was running down to zero on this prophecy may have prompted some expectation of imminent help.
- 3. In Ezek. 14:1; 20:1 they are called "the elders of Israel," not "the elders of Judah." But the two expressions are in many cases virtually synonymous in Ezekiel. Notice, for instance, how the charges in Ezek. 8 implicate both the house of Israel (8:6, 10–12) and the house of Judah (8:17). Indeed, the summary statement of 9:9 indicts "the house of Israel and Judah." See Walther Zimmerli, "Israel im Buche Ezechiel," VT 8 (1958): 82.
- 4. Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel, 58.
- 5. The NIV translation "to the entrance to the north gate of the inner court" is based on the MT. The phrase lit. translates: "to the entrance of the gate, the inner one, facing to the north." The word "inner one" is a feminine adjective that hangs oddly beside the masculine word "gate" (note that the participle "facing" is masculine); "inner one" is not attested by the LXX, and it disturbs the general flow of the chapter from outer parts inward (as in chs. 40–43) and should therefore be omitted. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:217.
- 6. The only other place in the Old Testament where an "incense burner" (miqteret) is found is in 2 Chron. 26:19, where Uzziah is similarly convicted of cultic irregularities.
- 7. Martin Schmidt, Prophet und Tempel (Zurich: Evangelischer Verlag, 1948), 139.
- 8. Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 293.
- 9. Schmidt, Prophet und Tempel, 139. This family was also closely associated with Jeremiah (Jer. 26:24; 29:3; 39:14); cf. Burke O. Long, "Social Dimensions of Prophetic Conflict," Semeia 21 (1982): 46.
- 10. Compare the opening vision, which described the wheels of the divine chariot as "full of eyes" (Ezek. 1:18).
- 11. Thorkild Jacobsen, "Toward the Image of Tammuz," in Toward the Image of Tammuz and Other Essays, ed. W. L. Moran (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1970), 100.
- 12. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 296.
- 13. These men are not here further identified; however, Ezek. 9:6 makes it clear that they too are elders. On this, see Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 70.
- 14. This obscure Hebrew phrase has inspired vast amounts of literature attempting to clarify it. In general it has been understood either as an insulting gesture or action of some kind, or as a final act of idolatry. See Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 299.
- 15. "He called in my hearing with a loud voice" (lit.) in Ezek. 9:1 closely parallels "[Though] they call in my hearing with a loud voice" (lit.) in 8:18.
- 16. So in 44:11 the Levites are assigned the duty of serving as guards ("having charge of" is the same word trans. "guards" in 9:1) at the gates of the new temple. See Rodney K. Duke, "Punishment or Restoration: Another Look at the Levites of Ezekiel 44:6–16," JSOT 40 (1988): 65.
- 17. The assonance of the Hebrew hanne' enāḥîm wehanne' enāqîm is lost in the NIV: "those who grieve and lament." Block translates "groan and moan" (Ezekiel 1–24, 307).
- 18. This total annihilation recalls the "holy war" associated with the occupation of the Promised Land (cf. Josh. 6:21).
- 19. Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 308.
- 20. Thus it is not coincidental that they appear at the north gate, the direction from which both divine and human enemies come in Ezekiel.
- 21. On the whole question of the veracity of Ezekiel's vision, see Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 65–68.

- 22. Bruce Vawter and Leslie J. Hoppe, Ezekiel (ITC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991), 66. Compare in this regard Moshe Greenberg's conception of "private" cults (i.e., those administered without benefit of clergy) in "Prolegomenon," Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy by C. C. Torrey and Critical Articles (New York: Ktav, 1970), xxxiii, n. 47.
- 23. See my Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel.
- 24. Robert S. Candlish, Studies in Genesis (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 1979 reprint), 327.
- 25. Tertullian, Against Marcion, 1.27.
- 26. H. Richard Niebuhr, The Kingdom of God in America (New York: Harper, 1959), 193.
- 27. Rob Owen, Gen X TV: The Brady Bunch to Melrose Place (Syracuse: Syracuse Univ. Press, 1997), 101.
- 28. See, for example, the account of such eclectic blends of religious elements among students given by Diane Winston in "Campuses Are a Bellwether for Society's Religious Revival," The Chronicle of Higher Education (January 16, 1998), A60
- 29. One young lady, Sheila Larson, has explicitly dubbed her own brand of customized faith "Sheilaism." Others have followed the same course more implicitly. For a description of "Sheilaism," see Robert N. Bellah et al., Habits of the Heart: Individualism and Commitment in American Life (New York: Harper & Row, 1986), 221, 235.
- 30. In the early church, baptism often involved the actual marking of the child with the sign of the cross on the forehead, which was seen as an exact parallel to the marking with a tāw that Ezekiel envisaged in Ezek. 9:4, since tāw in the ancient script took the shape of a cross (Origen, Selecta in Ezechielem, 13.800d; Tertullian, Against Marcion, 3.22; Jerome, Commentary on Ezekiel, 9:4–6). The Reformers were unconvinced by this (correct) observation (see Calvin, Ezekiel I, 218), and their Puritan followers argued strenuously against the "noxious ceremony" of signing the cross, seeing it as a superstitious, man-made ritual. The Directory of Public Worship produced by the Westminster Assembly therefore requires baptism to be "by pouring or sprinkling of water on the face of the child, without adding any other ceremony." However, though the ceremony itself may be unwarranted, the intent of those who defended the ceremony was in line with the biblical concept of baptism, as the words of the Book of Common Prayer make clear: "We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock and do sign him with the sign of the cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner, against sin, the world and the devil, and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end." The sign of the cross was not a magic amulet ensuring salvation, but a draft notice, enlisting the baptized into Christ's army. Having received "the king's shilling," as it were, one must now fight for Christ or face the consequences of being a draft-dodger.
- 31. Peculiar Speech: Preaching to the Baptized (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992), 7. See esp. the quote from the Book of Common Prayer in the previous note.
- 32. "Evangelicalism: Recovering a Tradition of Spiritual Depth," The Reformed Journal (September 1990): 25.

- 1. On divine abandonment, see Daniel I. Block, The Gods of the Nations (Jackson, Miss.: Evangelical Theological Society, 1988), 125–61.
- 2. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 155.
- 3. This may explain why the problems of gender confusion with regard to these creatures in Ezekiel 1 are resolved in chapter 10 They are due to the tension between the grammatical gender of the living creatures (feminine) and the reality they represent, the cherubim (masculine). See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 199.
- 4. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 191.
- 5. See my Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 114.
- See J. P. M. van der Ploeg, "Chefs du peuple d'Israel et leurs titres," RB 57 (1950): 42; Udo Rüterswörden, Die Beamten der israelitischen Königszeit: Eine Studie zu sr und vergleichbaren Begriffen (BWANT 117; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1985), 64.
- 7. Thomas Overholt, The Threat of Falsehood: A Study in the Theology of the Book of Jeremiah (SBT 16; London: SCM, 1970), 32.
- 8. So also Wevers, Ezekiel, 77. The RSV translates similarly, but as a statement rather than a question.
- 9. The spatial pairing "near" and "far off/away" is a standard one in Hebrew and is also found in Ezekiel 6:12 and 22:5, though without the same overtones of "inhabitant of the land/exile." In his commentary, Zimmerli notes that the nearest parallel to the unique Hebrew form used here occurs in the "far off" in Ps. 10:1, though he himself did not adopt a spatial understanding of "near" here (Ezekiel, 1:258).
- 10. Ezekiel, 54.
- 11. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 160; Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 187.
- 12. Wevers, Ezekiel, 77.
- 13. Eichrodt, Ezekiel, 167; Cooke, Ezekiel, 122.

- 14. Repointing the MT's imperative $(rah^2q\hat{u})$ as a perfect $(r\bar{a}h^2q\hat{u})$, along with most modern and some medieval interpreters. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:229.
- 15. Allen has noted the use of motifs from Ex. 6:6–8 in Ezek. 11:17–20 (as well as in 20:30–42) to depict the idea of a new exodus (Ezekiel 1–19, 165); however, the use actually starts earlier with the depiction of the anti-exodus from Jerusalem.
- 16. Lit., this phrase translates "the men of your redemption," i.e., those for whom Ezekiel has responsibility to act as their "redeemer," ensuring that their land remains associated with their name.
- 17. miqdāš me'at can either mean "a little sanctuary" (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 190) or "a sanctuary for a little time" (cf. NIV; RSV). Both translations are possible: for the former, cf. Dan. 11:34, while for the latter, see Hag. 2:6. Nevertheless, in a context where it is immediately followed by a promise of return, it seems best to understand it as a (positive) statement of the temporary nature of the Lord's presence among the exiles rather than a (negative) statement of the incompleteness of the Lord's presence with them (see Carl F. Keil, Ezekiel, trans. J. Martin, 2 vol. [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988 reprint], 1:151). The waw consecutive + imperfect thus introduces a logical contrast between the two halves of Ezek. 8:16.
- 18. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 164.
- 19. Notice how "the thoughts (literally "ascendings") of your spirit" (NIV "what is going through your mind") issue in the murders of 11:6. They form a natural opposition to the Lord's thoughts, which come to the prophet through the descending of the Lord's Spirit, which literally "falls" on Ezekiel (v. 5).
- 20. Compare Jer. 5:1–2, where the prophet Jeremiah, in Jerusalem, is told to search the city for one righteous person. Should even one be found, the Lord will spare the city.
- 21. Hugh G. M. Williamson, Ezra-Nehemiah (WBC 16; Waco, Tex.: Word, 1985), li, 16.
- 22. Gordon McConville writes: "The books express deep dissatisfaction with the exiles' situation under Persian rule; the situation is perceived as leaving room for a future fulfilment of the most glorious prophecies of Israel's salvation and the cause of the delayed fulfilment is Israel's sin" ("Ezra-Nehemiah and the Fulfilment of Prophecy," VT 36 [1986]: 223).
- 23. The equivalent form with theophoric element would be Azariah, "the Lord helps" (1 Kings 4:2), or Azriel, "God helps" (1 Chron. 5:24). The occurrence of such names in variant forms with or without the theophoric element is common in the Old Testament: e.g., Nathan/Nathaniel, Dan/Daniel, Obed/Obadiah.
- 24. The name Jaazaniah ben Shaphan in Ezekiel 8:11 has an equally appropriate ring to it. Like the other Jaazaniah, the Lord indeed hears what he is saying (8:12), while like a šāpān (a hyrax or rock badger) he is buried away in a subterranean cave. Indeed, the hyrax was itself an unclean animal (Lev. 11:5), a fitting image for the idolatrous worshipers to conjure up.
- 25. There is some discussion as to the exact number of these marks. Calvin mentions the first two (Institutes, 4.1.9) as does the Augsburg Confession, art. 7 and art. 19 of the Church of England. The third is added in the Belgic Confession (art. 29) and the First Scots Confession (ch. 18), while the Westminster Confession reduces them to a single point, "the profession of the true religion" (25.2). Those who mention three marks have included the things they regard as necessary for the well-being of the church, while the Westminster Confession has focused simply on the one thing necessary for the existence of the church.
- 26. Ezekiel I, 280.

- 1. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 209.
- 2. For darkness/evening as symbolic of judgment see Jer. 13:16 (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 210). The middle of the night is when judgment falls on Egypt (Ex. 12:29).
- 3. So Cooke, Ezekiel, 131.
- 4. Allen, Ezekiel 1-19, 179; Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 370.
- 5. The LXX translates: "So that he might not be seen." Similarly Cooke, Ezekiel, 132.
- 6. So the medieval Jewish commentators Rashi and Kimhi; similarly, Vawter & Hoppe, Ezekiel, 78.
- 7. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 219.
- 8. Indeed, "burden" ($m\bar{a}s's'\bar{a}'$) involves a further play on words, since it can refer either to a literal load to be carried, as in Ex. 23:5, or to a prophetic oracle, as in Isa. 14:28.
- 9. This ambiguity may account for the repeated use of the Hiphil of $y\bar{a}s\bar{a}$? ("to bring out") often where we would expect the simple Qal ("to go out"). The attraction to this formula may be linked to the idea of the journey into exile as an anti-exodus that we saw also in the previous chapter.
- 10. See esp. Ezek. 17:19–21, which uses similar language to 12:13–14 in depicting the consequences of Zedekiah's breach of covenant. Some commentators have suggested that Ezek. 17 may actually have been delivered earlier than Ezek. 12. See Thomas Krüger, Geschichtskonzepte im Ezechielbuch (BZAW 180; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1989), 404–6.

- 11. Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 376.
- 12. On this general sense of 'am-hā'āres, see Talmon, "Judean 'am-hā'āres," 71.
- 13. How Good Do We Have to Be? (Boston and New York: Little, Brown & Co., 1996), 12.
- 14. Harvie Conn, Evangelism: Doing Justice and Preaching Grace (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982), 33. See also the examples he gives on pp. 49–56.
- 15. Galatians 305 B, D. See Geoffrey W. H. Lampe, "Diakonia in the Early Church," in Service in Christ: Essays Presented to Karl Barth on his 80th Birthday, ed. J. I. McCord and T. H. L. Parker (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1966), 50.

- 1. Johannnes Herrmann suggests that it has been introduced here specifically in order to provide a link with what follows (Ezechielstudien, [BWAT 2; Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1908], 19). The connection is certainly not coincidental.
- 2. Cf. Ezek. 12:23–28; 13:21, 23; 14:11; 16:41–42, 63; 23:27; 34:10, 22, 28–29; 36:12, 14–15, 30; 37:22–23; 39:7, 28; 43:7; 45:8.
- 3. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 242.
- 4. Vawter and Hoppe, Ezekiel, 82.
- 5. See Ezek. 13:16; see also Jer. 6:14; 8:11.
- 6. Allen suggests that here "jackals" is the more appropriate translation since foxes hunt singly while jackals congregate in groups around ruins (Ezekiel 1–19, 201). However, foxes would presumably have found ruins equally conducive to their lifestyle, while the plural simply corresponds to the plural "prophets of Israel."
- 7. Henry L. Ellison, Ezekiel: The Man and His Message (London: Paternoster, 1956), 56. For a similar connection between foxes/jackals and ruins, see Lam. 5:18.
- 8. This metaphor has been vividly illuminated by the excavations of siege ramps and counter-ramps at Lachish. On these see Israel Eph'al, "The Assyrian Siege Ramp at Lachish," Tel Aviv 11 (1984): 60–70; David Ussishkin, "The Assyrian Attack on Lachish: The Archaeological Evidence From the Southwest Corner of the Site," Tel Aviv 17 (1990): 53–86.
- 9. The Hebrew word ḥayiş only occurs here in the Old Testament. In the Mishnah, this word denotes a rough stone wall not filled in with earth (Śeb. 3:8).
- 10. The word used here has been variously rendered and appears to be equivalent to "vanity" or "hogwash" (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 407).
- 11. This expression of judgment normally occurs with $n\bar{a}t\hat{a}$ (Ezek. 6:14; 14:9, 13; 16:27; 25:7, 13, 16; 35:3) while here in 13:9 it occurs with $h\bar{a}y\hat{a}$: "My hand will be against [them]." This construction, which elsewhere indicates the force of divine inspiration, is here used as a pun: Those who never felt the reality of the divine hand in inspiration will now feel it in judgment (see Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 237).
- 12. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 405.
- 13. Ezekiel too saw visions and recognized the potential effectiveness of divination. See Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 94.
- 14. For the meaning of this hapax legomenon, compare the usage of the Akkadian cognate kasû, "to bind," often in a magical context (H. W. F. Saggs, "'External Souls' in the Old Testament," JSS 19 [1974]: 5).
- 15. On the analogy of 1 Sam. 9:7, where the seer gives his oracle in return for a small payment of bread, this interpretation of the significance of the barley and bread is to be preferred to that which sees these as the materials for the magical practices. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:297.
- 16. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 245.
- 17. For one example of this, see Michael G. Maudlin, "Seers in the Heartland: Hot on the Trail of the Kansas City Prophets," Christianity Today 35 (Jan. 14, 1991): 18–22.
- 18. In a survey of Baby Boomers, Wade Clark Roof discovered that 26 percent of them "believed" in astrology (A Generation of Seekers: The Spiritual Journeys of the Baby Boom Generation [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993], 72).
- 19. For an example of this, see Donald Bloesch's review of The New Century Hymnal, ed. A. G. Clyde in Christianity Today (July 15, 1996): 49–50.
- 20. "Women in the Church: A Biblical Survey," in Bruce, A Mind for What Matters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), 263.
- 21. See Robert W. Yarbrough, "The Hermeneutics of 1 Timothy 2:9–15," in A. J. Köstenberger, T. R. Schreiner, and H. S. Baldwin (eds.) Women in the Church: A Fresh Analysis of 1 Timothy 2:9–15 (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995), 178–85.

- 1. See Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 110. On the strengthened position of the elders during and after the exile see Daniel L. Smith, Religion of the Landless (Bloomington, Ind.: Meyer-Stone, 1989), 94–99.
- 2. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 117.
- 3. The NIV's "I will . . . recapture [their] hearts" is probably too optimistic. tāpas' (lay hold of, seize) often has the sense of apprehend, arrest (e.g., Num. 5:13; Jer. 26:8). See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 249.
- 4. The language of "any Israelite or alien living in Israel" is anachronistic addressed to those in exile. It is used here as an echo of the priestly style of law found in the Pentateuch. For the similarities to Lev. 17, see Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 252.
- 5. Paul Joyce, Divine Initiative and Human Response in Ezekiel (JSOTS 51; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989), 67; Anthony Phillips, Ancient Israel's Criminal Law (Oxford: Blackwell, 1970), 29–30.
- 6. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20, 250.
- 7. In fact, the two practices were frequently linked, with excommunication often acting as a preparation for the covenantal death penalty. See William Horbury, "Extirpation and Excommunication," VT 35 (1985): 34.
- 8. Blenkinsopp, Ezekiel, 72.
- 9. Ezekiel uses the Qal and Hiphil forms of šûb together in his appeal. We might capture the flavor best by translating, "Turn and return."
- 10. Greenberg describes the phrase "they will be my people, and I will be their God" as "the essential expression of the bond between Israel and its God," an expression drawn from the terminology of marriage and adoption (Ezekiel 1–20, 254).
- 11. David Powlison, "Idols of the Heart and 'Vanity Fair,' "Journal of Biblical Counseling 13 (1995): 49. See also Edward T. Welch, When People Are Big and God Is Small: Overcoming Peer Pressure, Codependency, and the Fear of Man (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1997), 44–47.
- 12. "On Idolatry," The Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. A. Roberts & J. Donaldson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973), 3.61.
- 13. Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1.11.8.
- 14. This principle is classically expounded by George Whitefield in "The Method of Grace," Select Sermons of George Whitefield (London: Banner of Truth, 1964), 81–82.

- 1. James B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts, 2d ed. (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1955), 151, 153. See John Day, "The Daniel of Ugarit and Ezekiel and the Hero of the Book of Daniel," VT 30 (1980): 174–84.
- 2. Harald-Martin Wahl, "Noah, Daniel und Hiob in Ezechiel XIV 12–20 (21–3): Traditionsgechichtliche Hintergrund," VT 42 (1992): 551–52; Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 448–49.
- 3. The use of mythical elements is a common feature of the genre of oracles against the nations. See John B. Geyer, "Mythology and Culture in the Oracles Against the Nations," VT 36 (1986): 129–45.
- 4. Baruch Margalit complicates the interpretative possibilities further by arguing that there is an allusion to the nonbiblical Danel in Ezek. 14 but not in Ezek. 28! See The Ugaritic Poem of AQHT (Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 1989), 490.
- 5. This principle was not an inviolable rule, as Ezekiel's examples themselves show. Noah's children were preserved through the Flood because of their father's righteousness, but Job's children were not protected by his righteousness. However, the latter case is clearly regarded as the exception rather than the rule.
- 6. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 261.
- 7. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 450.
- 8. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 220.
- 9. See C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain (New York: Macmillan, 1962), 59.

- 1. Lawrence Boadt, "The Poetry of Prophetic Persuasion: Preserving the Prophet's Persona," CBQ 59 (1997): 19.
- 2. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 267. Note also the "how much less . . . " of 15:5, which is the same as "how much worse . . . " in 14:21.

- 3. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 214.
- 4. Diane Gabrielsen Scholl, "Alice Walker's Parable The Color Purple," Christianity and Literature 40 (1991): 259.
- 5. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 269.

- 1. The description of the genre of this passage as an "extended metaphor" or "narrative metaphor" comes from Julie Galambush, Jerusalem in the Book of Ezekiel: The City As Yahweh's Wife (SBLDS 130; Atlanta: Scholars, 1992), 11. Although the passage has allegorical features, it is not strictly an allegory, since there is not a point by point correspondence between the elements of the metaphor and the real world referents.
- 2. "Confront" (hôda; Ezek. 16:2) is legal terminology (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 272).
- 3. On the Hittites, see Gregory McMahon, "Hittites in the Old Testament," ABD, 3:231–33.
- 4. Galambush, Jerusalem, 81.
- 5. Meir Malul has pointed out the significance of Akkadian parallels in which a child is adopted ("caused to live") while "in its amniotic fluid and birth blood," meaning that the baby can never be reclaimed by its natural parents ("Adoption of Foundlings in the Bible and Mesopotamian Documents: A Study of Some Legal Metaphors in Ezekiel 16:1–7," JSOT 46 [1990]: 108–11).
- 6. NIV: "You . . . became the most beautiful of jewels. Your breasts were formed and your hair grew" should perhaps rather be translated, "You developed the ornament of ornaments, [namely] your breasts were formed and your [pubic] hair sprouted." The point is the physical development that accompanies the onset of puberty. See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 276.
- 7. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:340.
- 8. Again, the historical realities behind the metaphor peep through in the delay between the time of Jerusalem's birth and the time of the Lord's care for her. This delay is awkward in terms of the imagery of the foundling ("why was she not washed at once?"), but wholly comprehensible in terms of the underlying reality.
- 9. Galambush, Jerusalem, 95.
- 10. The beauty of Zion/Jerusalem is a central theme of Psalm 48.
- 11. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:344.
- 12. See the discussion in Morton Cogan, Imperialism and Religion: Assyria, Judah and Israel in the Eighth and Seventh Centuries B.C.E. (SBLMS 19; Missoula, Mont.: Scholars, 1974), 44–49.
- 13. Compare the rationale of Mishnah Sotah 1:5: "She exposed herself for sin, God therefore exposes her."
- 14. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 242.
- 15. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 288.
- 16. Ibid., 305.
- 17. The word "establish" (Hiphil of $q\hat{u}m$) is usually used of confirming an already existing covenant rather than originating a new relationship (Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 291). It thus serves to underline the continuity between Israel's future relationship with the Lord and his original purpose.
- 18. For "to atone" (kipper) as paying a ransom, see Gordon Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), 59.
- 19. Lit., "There will never again be opening of the mouth (i.e. self-justification) for you." See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 292.
- 20. Ezekiel, 141.
- 21. Cited in Thomas, Ezekiel, 108.
- 22. The tendency to downplay the "shocking" elements of this passage is no modern phenomenon; it is already present in the Targum, which mutes the sexual imagery (see Blenkinsopp, Ezekiel, 77).
- 23. Mystery and Manners: Occasional Prose, ed. Sally Fitzgerald (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1969), 48. In a similar vein, the novelist Larry Woiwode is quoted as saying, "If sin isn't mentioned or depicted, there's no need for redemption. How can the majesty of God's mighty arm be defined in a saccharin romance? Real sin is the curse we wrestle with every day" (Chris Stamper and Gene Veith, "Get Real," World [July 4–11, 1998]: 18).
- 24. Ezekiel II, trans. T. Myers (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1989), 181.

- 1. William McKane describes it as a statement "whose essence was opaqueness, mystification, enigma" (Proverbs: A New Approach [Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970], 267).
- 2. The Hebrew word nešer has a semantic range that includes both the griffon-vulture and the eagle. Here the abundance of feathers and the greatness attributed to the bird clearly indicates the latter.
- 3. Lit., "the land of Canaan." The equation "Canaanites" = "merchants" is due to the particular affinity of the Phoenicians for trade and is found also in Zeph. 1:11 and perhaps in the ambiguous Zech. 14:21.
- 4. Allen appropriately describes the rival eagle as "somewhat damned by faint praise" (Ezekiel 1–19, 257).
- 5. For a survey of the historical events referred to in this chapter, see the Introduction.
- 6. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 321.
- 7. Ibid., 322.
- 8. This "high and lofty mountain . . . of Israel" can only be Mount Zion. See Jon D. Levenson, Theology of the Program of Restoration of Ezekiel 40–48 (HSM 10; Missoula, Mont.: Scholars, 1976), 7.
- 9. A similar expectation is found in Isa. 11:1, where a shoot is anticipated, springing "from the stump of Jesse." See Otto Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, trans. R. A. Wilson (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1972), 157. Note also the similarity of Isa. 10:33b and Ezek. 17:24.
- 10. Walter Brueggemann, Cadences of Home: Preaching Among Exiles (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1997), 42.
- 11. ANET, 205.
- 12. Morton Cogan, Imperialism and Religion, 48-49.

- 1. A true proverb applied to the wrong situation will lead to a false conclusion. "A stitch in time saves nine" is a valid proverb, yet if used where the appropriate proverb is rather, "Fools rush in where angels dare to tread," the results may be disastrous. Hence Prov. 26:9 warns: "Like a thornbush in a drunkard's hand is a proverb in the mouth of a fool."
- 2. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:375
- 3. These kinds of "legal lists" for those who sought nearness to God are found elsewhere in the Old Testament (e.g., Ps. 15; Isa. 33:15) and elsewhere in the ancient Near East. On these lists, see Gordon H. Matties, Ezekiel 18 and the Rhetoric of Moral Discourse (SBLDS 126; Atlanta: Scholars, 1990), 88–105, and Moshe Weinfeld, "Instructions for Temple Visitors in the Bible and in Ancient Egypt," Egyptological Studies (ScrHier 28; Jerusalem: Magnes, 1982), 224–28.
- 4. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 329. He also points out that the pairing of lifting up the eyes with mountains evokes an apostate version of Ps. 121:1: "I lift up my eyes to the hills—where does my help come from?" In place of the orthodox response, "My help comes from the LORD, the Maker of heaven and earth," the apostate seeks help from the idols whose high places are situated there.
- 5. This succession of three generations (righteous-unrighteous-righteous) is not a purely hypothetical construct but some scholars suggest a correspondence to the historical succession of Josiah-Jehoiakim-Jehoiachin. This perhaps accounts for the placement of Ezekiel 18 between chapters 17 and 19, which focus on the fate of the royal line; Ezekiel 18 would then further justify hope for the future of the exiled Jehoiachin. See Antti Laato, Josiah and David Redivivus: The Historical Josiah and the Messianic Expectations of Exilic and Postexilic Times (ConBOT 33; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1992), 358.
- 6. For maddûa' as a rhetorical device expressing affected surprise (18:19), see BDB 396c. The New Living Translation renders it: "'What?' you ask. 'Doesn't the child pay for the parent's sins?'"
- 7. Joyce, Divine Initiative, 48.
- 8. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 337.
- 9. Joyce, Divine Initiative, 52.
- 10. For this translation, see Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 267.
- 11. The rhetorical device of calling on the hearers to do for themselves something that ultimately only the Lord can do, is also found in Deuteronomy, where Moses tells the people both that they must circumcise their hearts (Deut. 10:16) and that God will circumcise their hearts (30:6). The point is that God can be relied upon to act faithfully to his promises and to carry through in us the good work he has begun.
- 12. For the history of this discussion, see Matties, Ezekiel 18, 115–25.
- 13. See J. Gordon McConville, "Narrative and Theology in the Book of Kings," Biblica 70 (1989): 45.
- 14. On the concepts of "life" and "death," see Walther Zimmerli, "'Leben' und 'Tod' im Buche des Propheten Ezechiel," ThZ 13 (1957): 494–508.
- 15. New York: Schocken, 1981.
- 16. For a response, see Dan McCartney, Why Does It Have to Hurt?

- 17. "Sin is not a cul de sac, nor is guilt a final trap. Sin may be washed away by repentance and return, and beyond guilt is the dawn of forgiveness. The door is never locked, the threat of doom is not the last word" (Abraham Heschel, The Prophets [New York: Harper & Row, 1969], 1:174).
- 18. "The Wailing of Risca," The New Park Street and Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, vol. 7 (Pasadena, Tex.: Pilgrim, 1961, 1969 reprint), 11.

- 1. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 285–86. Alternatively, the prophetic use can be described as a "parody" of the lament genre, infusing an incongruous content into a familiar style (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 594).
- 2. Ronald M. Hals calls it "incredibly crass" (Ezekiel [FOTL 19; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989], 130).
- 3. Block demonstrates that there are several lexical links between the two passages (Ezekiel 1–24, 603, 608). Ezekiel will also allude to Gen. 49:9–10 in Ezek. 21:27.
- 4. On Ezekiel's distinctive usage of the phrase "the princes of Israel" (v. 1), see Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 10–57.
- 5. Ezek. 19:2a should be translated as a question: "What is your mother? A lioness!" See Block, Ezekiel 1-24, 595.
- 6. Commentators disagree as to the method of hunting. Against the conventional translation of šaḥat as "pit," here and in v. 8, Moshe Held has argued that it rather denotes a kind of net, cognate with Akkadian šētu ("Pits and Pitfalls in Akkadian and Biblical Hebrew," JANESCU 5 [1973]: 173–90). Both methods of hunting lions are attested in antiquity.
- 7. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:394.
- 8. The NIV here emends a difficult Hebrew text. Taking the MT as it stands, Greenberg explains the literal "he knew his widows" as "he came to know those whom his actions had made widows" (Ezekiel 1–20, 351).
- 9. The Delphic oracle was fond of such ambiguity, as when it told Croesus that if he went to war, he would certainly destroy a great kingdom. The statement was true but deceptive, for the great kingdom he destroyed was not that of his enemies, as he had supposed, but his own.
- 10. So, most recently, Allen (Ezekiel 1–19, 288). Allen argues on the stylistic grounds that the object of a prophetic lament is the future, not the past. The older argument based on identifying the mother lioness as Hamutal, the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, is less convincing.
- 11. Block has now suggested Jehoiakim for the second lion, reviving an older interpretation, with Jehoiachin and Zedekiah both represented in the oracle against the vine (Ezekiel 1–24, 605). This further underlines the complexity of the task of identification.
- 12. MT has (lit.) "in your blood" (see NIV note), which may be due to attraction to the similar phrase in Ezek. 16:6, 22. Two Hebrew manuscripts have the reading "your vineyard."
- 13. NIV "thick foliage" is possible, but Ezekiel uses the same word also in 31:3, 10, 14 to describe a majestic cedar, and there "clouds" seems clearly a better translation. See Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–20, 353.
- 14. The True and Only Heaven: Progress and Its Critics (New York: Norton, 1991), 221.
- 15. For a classic example of this approach, see C. Peter Wagner, Frontiers in Mission Strategy (Chicago: Moody, 1971), 41–47.
- 16. Wagner states confidently, "This is not the norm" (ibid., 47).

- 1. The exact title given to this group varies. In Ezek. 8:11 they are called the "elders of the house of Israel," while 14:1 and 20:1, 3 speak of the "elders of Israel." Probably the same group is indicated by the "elders of Judah" in 8:1 (Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 112).
- 2. Ibid., 113–18.
- 3. The niphal of dāraš (seek, inquire of) in the Lord's statement is often translated as a "tolerative Niphal" ("I will not allow them to inquire of me"). However, as Bruce Waltke and Michael O'Connor point out, "the tolerative Niphal often involves the element of efficacy: what the subject allows to happen can indeed be carried through" (An Introduction to Biblical Hebrew Syntax [Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1990], 23.4g). Thus, the point is not so much that the Lord will put a stop to their seeking but their seeking will be ineffective; they will seek but not find.
- 4. Commentators have made many ingenious suggestions as to the substance of their query, based on inferences drawn from Ezekiel's response to them. But the whole point is that Ezekiel's response is not an answer to their inquiry! See

- Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20, 387-88.
- 5. The phrase "the detestable practices of their fathers" is itself a striking inversion of the regular Deuteronomic phrase "the detestable ways of the nations" (Deut. 18:9). At the outset, Ezekiel's charge is clear: Israel's ancestors were no better than the pagan nations they replaced in Canaan (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 620).
- 6. My analysis is broadly the same as that of Franz Sedlmeier, Studien zu Komposition und Theologie von Ezechiel 20 (Stuttgarter Biblische Beiträge 21; Stuttgart: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1990), 212.
- 7. This is the only use in Ezekiel of the verb $b\bar{a}har$ ("he chose"). This verb is a favorite of Deuteronomic literature to express the relationship between the Lord and Israel; see Moshe Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic School (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972), 327.
- 8. tûr is earlier used of the Lord's preparing campsites in the desert ahead of his people (Deut. 1:33) and of the spies reconnoitering the land (Num. 13:1–2). These echoes underline the history of Israel's perverseness: Before the spies searched out the land and by a majority vote declared it unsuitable, God had already searched it out and declared it good.
- 9. The historical validity of this representation is frequently questioned (e.g., by Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:409). However, the rapidity with which the people slid into idolatry in the desert, constructing a golden calf barely three months after their departure from Egypt (Ex. 32), hardly suggests that their pre-exodus state was one of untarnished devotion to the Lord!
- 10. Walter J. Harrelson, From Fertility Cult to Worship (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1969), 30. Compare Matitiyahu Tsevat, "The Basic Meaning of the Biblical Sabbath," ZAW 84 (1972): 455.
- 11. The NIV's "So I said . . ." (Ezek. 20:8, 13, 21) is too weak. For 'āmar as "threaten" see BDB 56c, which cites also Deut. 9:25; see also NLT.
- 12. Note that these "not good" statutes and laws are not termed "my decrees and . . . laws" by the Lord (in contrast to the "good" statutes and laws that they rejected (Ezek. 20:11, 19, 24). See Leslie C. Allen, Ezekiel 20–48 (WBC 29; Dallas: Word, 1990), 12.
- 13. On this practice, see George C. Heider, The Cult of Molek: A Reassessment (JSOTS 43; Sheffield: JSOT, 1985).
- 14. So NIV; Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20, 371.
- 15. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:414.
- 16. Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 651.
- 17. See Rodney Clapp, "Why the Devil Takes Visa: A Christian Response to the Triumph of Consumerism," Christianity Today 40 (Oct. 7, 1996): 19–33.
- 18. "The Church of the 90's: Meeting the Needs of a Changing Culture," Reformed Seminary Journal (September 1990), 11. This trend is already visible. Wade Clark Roof cites the case of a man who described himself as "primarily Catholic," who as well as attending weekly Mass also belongs to an ecumenical prayer group and frequently worships at a local evangelical church because of its "good preaching" (A Generation of Seekers, 245).
- 19. See R. C. Sproul, Choosing My Religion (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995).
- 20. Roof states: "Personal autonomy rather than family heritage or religious background will increasingly be the basis on which one relates to the sacred. What a person chooses rather than is born into will be decisive" (A Generation of Seekers, 259).
- 21. Ezekiel never uses the terminology of the "new Jerusalem" for the visionary city of the future, probably because of his negative portrayal of its past. For him, Jerusalem is the Great Prostitute (cf. Ezek. 16; 23). But it is clear what city he has in mind, in purified form, and the language of Revelation 21:2 suggests that such a designation is appropriate for our use.
- 22. "A New Way of Being the Church? Liberation Theology and the Mission of the Church in a Postmodern Context," Evangel 14 (Summer 1996): 50.
- 23. C. S. Lewis, The Weight of Glory and Other Addresses (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), 10.
- 24. A study of attitudes among members of Generation X (those born between 1963 and 1977) cites "lack of dogmatism" as one of five main characteristics that Xers are looking for in faith groups. See Andrés Tapia, "Reaching the First Post-Christian Generation," Christianity Today 38 (Sept. 12, 1994): 18–23.
- 25. This portrayal of God as an abuser and exploiter is not merely an ancient heresy; it is precisely the picture of God that David Halperin reads into this passage (Seeking Ezekiel, 170).
- 26. The Red Rose Collection, San Francisco, Calif.; October 1996.
- 27. See Religion and Medical Ethics, ed. Allen Verhey (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996), 135–38.
- 28. As Frederica Mathewes-Green points out, the idolatry is not always on the part of the women who have the abortion; frequently, family or peer pressure are significant factors ("Why Women Choose Abortion," Christianity Today 39 (Jan. 9, 1995): 21–25.
- 29. Williamson, Ezra, Nehemiah, li.
- 30. See, for example, Gustavo Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, trans. C. I. & J. Eagleson (Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis, 1973), 159.

- 1. The Hebrew versification is five verses different in this chapter from the English; the references in the commentary are to the English verse numbers.
- 2. MT has the indefinite miqdāšîm ("sanctuaries"); this is frequently repointed miqdāšām ("their sanctuary"), a reading actually found in a few manuscripts (Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 19). Others identify the plural sanctuaries as the pagan shrines of Israel (see Wevers, Ezekiel, 1623).
- 3. Moshe Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37 (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1997), 420.
- 4. Lit., "with crushing of the loins"; the loins were considered the seat of internal strength in the ancient Near East.
- 5. Many commentators, along with the NIV, assume that it is "the news" that has come. However, in view of the obvious connection of the following phrase to Ezek. 7:14, it is better to see in the "it has come" $(b\bar{a}\hat{'}a)$ a reference back to the repeated prophecy of the judgment that would come $(b\bar{a}\hat{'}a)$; 7:5, 7, 10; cf. the masculine $b\bar{a}\hat{'}$ in 7:6, 12). See the translations adopted in the KJV, RSV, and NEB.
- 6. The Hebrew of this oracle is in places very obscure. Particularly difficult are v. 10b, which the NIV renders, "Shall we rejoice in the scepter of my son LJudahl? The sword despises every such stick," and v. 13, where the NIV has, "Testing will surely come. And what if the scepter Lof Judahl, which the sword despises, does not continue? declares the Sovereign LORD." These verses have so far defied the ability of commentators to make grammatical or logical sense of them; they may be marginal notes that have crept into the text (so Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 19–20).
- 7. Clapping the hands can have a variety of meanings in the Old Testament, and the gesture has been variously interpreted. However, here, as in 6:11, it introduces a proclamation of judgment and is best interpreted as evincing anger (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 679).
- 8. NIV: "and my wrath will subside" (v. 17) sounds as if the cooling of God's anger is not directly related to Israel's punishment; in fact, it is precisely through executing judgment on his people that his wrath will be satisfied.
- 9. yād here refers to an inscribed stone monument that simply served to mark the division of two routes (see Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:442).
- 10. As Allen suggests (Ezekiel 20–48, 27).
- 11. On the office of mazkir, see Henning G. Reventlow, "Das Amt des Mazkir: Zur Rechtsstruktur des öffentlichen Lebens in Israel," ThZ 15 (1959): 161–75.
- 12. Like mazkîr, tāpas' stems from the sphere of law and order. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:445.
- 13. There may also be a pun intended on Zedekiah's name, which means "The LORD is righteous."
- 14. This theme of the reversal of the status of a vassal as an exercise of royal power on the part of the Great King is also attested in Assyrian sources. See Donald J. Wiseman, The Vassal-Treaties of Esarhaddon (London: The British School of Archaeology in Iraq, 1958), 44, lines 191–92.
- 15. This understanding is already present in the Targum and was widespread in the earlier part of this century; hence Cooke translates "to whom the right belongs" and adds, "a hint at the coming of one who will have the right to wear the crown, who will be the true king" (Ezekiel, 235). However, mišpāṭ nowhere else in Ezekiel has this sense of "right, claim."
- 16. See William Moran, "Gen 49:10 and Its Use in Ezekiel 21:32," Bib 39 (1958): 405–25.
- 17. Compare the similar reshaping of Gen. 49:9–10 in Ezek. 19, noted above.
- 18. Iain Duguid, "Messianic Themes in Zechariah 9–14," in The Lord's Anointed: Interpretation of Old Testament Messianic Texts, ed. P. E. Satterthwaite, R. S. Hess, and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995), 278.
- 19. For more help in understanding biblical images, see L. Ryken, J. C. Wilhoit, and T. Longman III, eds. Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downer's Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998).
- 20. Jonathan Edwards on Heaven and Hell (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980), 91. For a good recent defense of the traditional position, see Robert A. Peterson, Hell on Trial: The Case for Eternal Punishment (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1995).
- 21. The Problem of Pain, 116.

- 1. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:456.
- 2. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 38.
- 3. Reventlow, Wächter über Israel, 101-6.
- 4. MT has "with the blood." Ezek. 18:6, 11, 15 correspond to 22:9, but cf. 33:25.

- 5. To "forget" the Lord is distinctively covenantal language; see Willi Schottroff, "TDU," THAT, 902.
- 6. Reading w^eniḥaltî, "I will be defiled" for MT w^eniḥalt, "you will be defiled." The versions also have the first person singular, though they derive their translations from the root nāḥal, "to inherit." See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:454, and compare 36:20 for the same idea.
- 7. Ezekiel 20–48, 37. The theme of God's scattering and dispersing his people among the nations is prominent in Ezekiel, being found also in 12:15; 20:23; 36:19.
- 8. Other examples of gathering as the redemptive reversal of scattering in Jeremiah and Ezekiel include Jer. 23:3; 29:14; 31:8, 10; 32:37; 49:5; Ezek. 20:41; 28:25; 29:13; 34:13; 36:24; 37:21; 38:8; 39:27.
- 9. The NIV, following the LXX and most commentators, reads $l\bar{o}$ humt $l\bar{o}$ not rained on") rather than $l\bar{o}$ m $l\bar{o}$ that it fits the parallelism better. See Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 32. This emendation is possible but not required, especially if the "showering" is a negative rather than a positive image.
- 10. Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 38; Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:467.
- 11. Rabbinic commentators discussed whether this verse implies that the great flood bypassed Israel (b. Zebaḥ. 113a). Such expectations of a future flood were apparently also present in Babylon; see Moshe Anbar, "Une nouvelle allusion à une tradition babylonienne dans Ezechiel (22:24)," VT 29 (1979): 352–53.
- 12. The fact of a relationship between these two passages has been generally recognized for over a century. The direction of the dependence has been debated, but to my mind the clinching argument in favor of the priority of Zephaniah is the use of b^e*qirbāh* in v. 27 rather than betôkāh, which is found frequently elsewhere in this chapter.
- 13. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 462.
- 14. For this sense of 'am-hā'āreṣ, see Talmon, "'am-hā'āreṣ," 68–78.
- 15. See Richard J. Clifford, The Cosmic Mountain in Canaan and the Old Testament (HSM 4; Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1972), 3.
- 16. This idea was more fully developed in the rabbinic sources than in the Old Testament, but it is present in the idea of Jerusalem as the "center" or "navel" (Ezek. 38:12) of the earth, that is, the point from which the creation of the earth proceeded. See Jon D. Levenson, Sinai and Zion (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1985), 115.
- 17. See Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16 (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1991), 713.
- 18. The original Latin poem dates back to around the thirteenth century. This translation is by W. J. Irons, printed in Hymns Ancient and Modern. For its appropriateness in connection with this passage, see Millard Lind, Ezekiel (Believer's Church Bible Commentary; Scottdale, Pa.: Herald, 1996), 191.
- Daniel Patrick Moynihan, "Defining Deviancy Down," The American Scholar (Winter 1993). See also Gertrude Himmelfarb, The De-Moralization of Society: From Victorian Virtues to Modern Values (New York: Alfred Knopf, 1995), 234–37.
- 20. "Prince's Faith Receives Carey's Blessing," The [London] Times (Dec. 23, 1996).
- 21. For a contemporary writer not afraid to speak of sin and the wrath of God, see D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, Romans 3:20–4:25; Atonement and Justification (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970), 6–10.
- 22. This principle of law first and then gospel was laid out in the original Puritan manual of preaching, William Perkins' The Art of Prophesying (Carlisle, Pa.: Banner of Truth, 1996, reprint of 1606 original). Its continuing influence is clear in C. H. Spurgeon's "A Plain Man's Sermon," where he asserts: "The law is the needle, and you cannot draw the silken thread of the gospel through a man's heart, unless you first send the needle of the law through the center thereof, to make way for it" (Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit: Sermons Preached and Revised in 1886, vol. 32 [London: Banner of Truth, 1969], 27). Similarly, R. B. Kuiper states: "The call to repentance must come first in evangelism" (God-Centered Evangelism [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1961], 134).

- 1. Paul Ricoeur, "The Metaphorical Process As Cognition, Imagination and Feeling," On Metaphor, ed. S. Sacks (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1978), 154, cited in Galambush, Jerusalem, 8.
- 2. Galambush, Jerusalem, 110.
- 3. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 48.
- 4. For a similar list of Israel's failings in the desert, see Ps. 106:7–39.
- 5. The details are recorded on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III; see ANET, 280–81.
- 6. Galambush sees here a reference to Israel's subsequent rebellion against Assyria on the strength of Egyptian support (Jerusalem, 112). However, although this was certainly a further manifestation of the same mindset, seeking human deliverers instead of the Lord, this does not seem to be in the prophet's mind; it is Oholah's Egyptian lifestyle that she does not abandon (lit., "her adultery from Egypt"), not her Egyptian lover.

- 7. Alan R. Millard, "Sennacherib's Attack on Hezekiah," TynBul 36 (1985): 71.
- 8. Deut. 7:18; 15:15; 16:3, 12; 24:18, 22.
- 9. Simon J. DeVries, "Remembrance in Ezekiel: A Study of an Old Testament Theme," Int 16 (1962): 64.
- 10. Is it significant that the Hiphil of $\hat{u}r$ can have a sexual connotation, as in Song 2:7; 3:5; 8:4? See BDB, 735c.
- 11. Whether these last three are historical allies of Judah or Chaldean tribes is debated. The three names suggest a sinister wordplay, sounding like "punish," "cry for help," and "shriek" (Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 50).
- 12. This is presumably metaphorical "overkill" since all three fates cannot simultaneously occur to individuals. Alternatively, three different (though equivalent) fates may be in view; compare the use of the same three modes of death in Ezek. 5:2.
- 13. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 484.
- 14. Rhetorically, the charge is addressed to Oholah as well as Oholibah. However, as with the metaphor itself, the focus is clearly on Jerusalem (Oholibah) as the charge of "defil[ing] my sanctuary" (23:38) makes clear.
- 15. The reference to "women" here is not a moralizing application to women and adultery in general (so Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 1:492) but rather figurative, as in v. 10. However, it can scarcely be figurative of the nations (so Eichrodt, Ezekiel, 333; Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 51) since they do not exist in the same covenant relationship to the Lord in Ezekiel. If a specific application is to be sought, they are surely figurative of future generations within the covenant people, who will learn from the fall of Samaria and Jerusalem the lesson that the generation prior to the Exile was unable or unwilling to learn from the fall of Samaria.
- 16. For the curious, in former days cricket pitches were left uncovered during rain delays. During the period after a rain delay, as the pitch (or "wicket") was drying out, the ball would frequently bounce or spin unexpectedly off a damp spot, causing great difficulties to the unfortunate batsman. In recent years, with pitches fully covered to ensure rapid resumption of play after a rain delay, "sticky wickets" are only a memory.
- 17. See Max Black, Models and Metaphors: Studies in Language and Philosophy (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell Univ. Press, 1962).
- 18. See Don Richardson, Peace Child (Glendale: Regal, 1974).
- 19. Ronald E. Clements, Ezekiel (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996), 108.
- 20. Athalya Brenner, "Pornoprophetics Revisited: Some Additional Reflections" JSOT 70 (1996): 63–86. J. Cheryl Exum terms this chapter "the most pornographic example of divine violence" (Plotted, Shot and Painted: Cultural Representations of Biblical Women [JSOTS 215; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996], 109).
- 21. Galambush, Jerusalem, 23.
- 22. Ibid., 59.
- 23. For a thoughtful study of the issues, see Vern Poythress, "Just Penalties for Sexual Crimes," The Shadow of Christ in the Law of Moses (Brentwood, Tenn.: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1991), 193–221.
- 24. Paradoxically, the parable of the good Samaritan has become equally hard to expound in a context where the adjective "good" is entirely comfortable, even expected, next to the noun "Samaritan."
- 25. John F. Bettler, "Counseling and the Doctrine of Sin," Journal of Biblical Counseling 13 (1994): 2.

- 1. On the date, see Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 772–73.
- 2. Wenham, Leviticus, 63.
- 3. 'el is ambiguous and can either mean the parable is to be addressed "to" the rebellious house or that it is "about" the rebellious house (Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 497).
- 4. It occurs fourteen times in the book: 2:5-6; 3:9, 26-27; 12:2-3, 9, 25; 17:12; 44:6.
- 5. "To gather" is usually the language of restoration. Here, however, as in 22:19–22, the language has been diverted to speak of destruction.
- 6. MT has the word for "bones," but the bones are in the pot, not underneath it. It should be a similar word meaning "wood," as in verse 10.
- 7. The Hebrew for "put . . . on" ($\check{s}^e p \bar{o} t$, 24:3) sounds almost exactly like "judge" ($\check{s} \bar{a} p a t$).
- 8. This rather obscure word, which occurs only in this chapter, is normally translated "rust" (RSV) or "corrosion" (Allen), a condition affecting the pot itself. Thus the NIV renders it "the pot now encrusted." However, it may rather be referring to the contamination wrought by what is inside the vessel ("the pot whose filth is in her") rather than on the vessel itself (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 778). This fits better with the depiction of the city of bloodshed in Ezekiel 22, which stresses repeatedly the defilement "in her."
- 9. The NIV, following MT, renders this "mixing in the spices." However, this translation does not fit the context, and the LXX and some manuscripts support the possibility that metathesis of Hebrew letters has occurred, so that the text should read, "remove the broth." The removal of broth leaves the meat dry in the cauldron, ready to be burned. See Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 767.

- 10. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21-37, 509.
- 11. The cultic overtones of the intended meal are further underlined by the use of a copper caldron as opposed to the standard domestic cookware made of pottery (Block, Ezekiel 1–24, 776).
- 12. The English words "witness" and "martyr" can both be used to translate a single Greek word, and in the early church the concepts frequently became synonymous.

- 1. Daniel I. Block, Ezekiel 25–48 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 5.
- 2. Stuart, Ezekiel, 249.
- 3. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 17.
- 4. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 67.
- 5. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 526.
- 6. An exception to this general rule is Jeremiah's prophecy against Babylon, which he entrusted to the staff officer Seraiah to read when he got to Babylon (Jer. 51:59–64). This is the exception that proves the rule, however.
- 7. Skinner, Ezekiel, 217.
- 8. Mark Galli, "Is Persecution Good for the Church?" Christianity Today 41 (May 19, 1997): 16–19.

- 1. The absence of a specific month is unusual since most of Ezekiel's dated oracles contain day, month, and year. The proposal of BHS that an original reference to the eleventh month has dropped out because the numeral was the same as that of the year is the most plausible (Cooke, Ezekiel, 294). Alternatively, Allen proposes that the unusual form of eleven is itself a corruption of the twelfth year (Ezekiel 20–48, 71). He leaves the month indeterminate.
- 2. Allen suggests that Tyre stood to benefit from Jerusalem's fall primarily in political rather than economic terms (Ezekiel 20–48, 75). That may be a correct observation in historical terms, but the oracles themselves focus entirely on Tyre as a leader in international commerce.
- 3. The description shows no interest in the peculiar difficulties of assaulting an island city, where the conventional means of siege walls and ramps and formations protected from above by shields (Ezek. 26:8) are rather problematic. Though Nebuchadnezzar's assault greatly reduced Tyre's significance and power, the city itself was not destroyed until the time of Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), who built a causeway out from the mainland to the island in order to be able to capture the city.
- 4. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:71.
- 5. Thomas Boston, The Crook in the Lot (Wilmington, Del.: Sovereign Grace, 1972 reprint), 12. John Flavel similarly poses the question to the one experiencing affliction: "What if by the loss of outward comforts God preserves your soul from the ruining power of temptation?" (The Works of John Flavel, vol. 5 [London: Banner of Truth, 1968 reprint], 443).
- 6. Peterson, Reversed Thunder, 146.

- 1. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 93.
- 2. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 95.
- 3. See ANET, 149-55; Day, "The Daniel of Ugarit and Ezekiel," 174-84.
- 4. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 574; Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 96.
- 5. Nine of the twelve stones from the high priest's breastplate are listed here, with the third set of three from the list in Ex. 28 omitted, perhaps accidentally during the course of the transmission of the text.
- 6. The Hebrew may also be read, "you were on the holy mount, you were a divine being" (Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 584), emphasizing the essence of the sin of the king of Tyre. Like the original sin, it involved the claim to have "be[come] like

- God" (Gen. 3:5).
- 7. "Walking about" (hithallāk) occurs frequently in the context of the sanctuary. See Gordon Wenham, "Sanctuary Symbolism in the Garden of Eden Story," in I Studied Inscriptions From Before the Flood: Ancient Near Eastern Literary and Linguistic Approaches to Genesis 1–11, ed. R. S. Hess and D. T. Tsumura (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1994), 400–401. The reference to "stones of fire" is obscure but may refer to a hedge of sparkling gemstones around the garden.
- 8. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 99.
- 9. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 4.
- 10. On the connection between these two passages, see Mark R. Strom, "An Old Testament Background to Acts 12:20–23," NTS 32 (1986): 289–92.
- 11. See Os Guinness, Dining With the Devil: The Megachurch Movement Flirts With Modernity (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993), 71.
- 12. Our addiction to experts is prominent even where the results of our dependence are less than impressive. Anne Cassidy notes that this generation of children has been raised more by the advice of experts than any that preceded it. In spite of that fact, parents seem to be more bewildered and children more out of control than ever. Her radical solution is less, not more, dependence on "child development experts" ("Best Parenting Instructions Are Built in," Chicago Tribune [July 31, 1998], 1/25).
- 13. For the pitfalls of such politicization, see Charles W. Colson, "The Power Illusion," in Michael C. Horton (ed.) Power Religion (Chicago: Moody, 1992), 25–38.

- 1. Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 128. In each case, the new section is introduced by the formula "The word of the LORD came to me..." and in every case except Ezek. 30:1 the oracle is dated.
- 2. The MT has tannîm ("jackals") but the rest of the water-based imagery requires reading tannîm ("sea monster"), along with many manuscripts and versions. The MT may be the result of a scribal error or an otherwise unknown variant form (Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 102).
- 3. John Day, God's Conflict With the Dragon and the Sea (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1985), 94–95.
- 4. ANET, 374; cited in Lind, Ezekiel, 244.
- 5. The Egyptian loanword y^e ' $\bar{o}r$ can be translated either "Nile" or "streams." The NIV, like many modern translations, utilizes both English words in this chapter to translate this single Hebrew word.
- 6. RSV reads $l\bar{o}$ $tiqq\bar{a}b\bar{e}r$ ("you shall... not be ... buried") along with many Hebrew manuscripts and the Targum, for the MT $l\bar{o}$ $tiqq\bar{a}b\bar{e}s$ ("you will not be collected"). Whether or not this emendation is correct, it at least underscores the purpose of the gathering: This is not the gathering of return from exile but merely of bodies for burial, as in 2 Sam. 21:13–14.
- 7. Greenberg cites Sargon II of Assyria's statement that his contemporary counterpart in Egypt was "a king who cannot save" (Ezekiel 21–37, 604).
- 8. Donald Gowan is typical when he writes: the prophet "does not find it necessary to defend or explain away his earlier prophecy; in effect he just admits that it didn't happen" (When Man Becomes God [Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1975], 103. Similarly, Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 617; Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 149.
- 9. Contra Apionem, 1.156; Antiquities, 10.228.
- 10. Cambridge Ancient History, 2d ed., 235.
- 11. Leslie Allen, having accepted that this oracle originates in the failure of the earlier prophecy, then goes on to note that "the redactional agenda of these verses is a different one" (Ezekiel 20–48, 111). It is the "redacted" (i.e., inscripturated) agenda with which we are concerned here.
- 12. Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 616.
- 13. See NIV note. This nation is otherwise unknown from the ancient Near Eastern sources, unless it is a mistake for Lub, which is another term for (part of) Libya.
- 14. "The people of the covenant land" is frequently taken as an oblique reference to Judah (e.g., Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 115; Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 159). However, the phrase "the land of the covenant," despite its biblical sounding overtones, nowhere else occurs to designate the Promised Land. The closest parallel is in Obad. 7, which speaks of "the men of your covenant," which the NIV appropriately renders "your allies."
- 15. See Edmund P. Clowney, "The New Israel," in Carl E. Armerding and W. Ward Gasque, ed., Dreams, Visions and Oracles: The Layman's Guide to Biblical Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1977), 207–20.
- 16. For this, see Iain Duguid, "Hagar the Egyptian: A Note on the Allure of Egypt in the Abraham Cycle," WTJ 56 (1994): 419–21.

- 1. It is interesting to note in passing that the "strong-armed man" was apparently a title appropriated by the Pharaoh of the day. See James K. Hoffmeier, "The Arm of God Versus the Arm of Pharaoh in the Exodus Narratives," Bib 67 (1986): 378–87.
- 2. Some have seen in the breaking of the two arms of Pharaoh, a reference to an attack launched by the Egyptian on two fronts, by land and by sea. One of these attacks had been defeated, and the other would likewise come to nothing (Kenneth S. Freedy and Donald B. Redford, "The Dates in Ezekiel in Relation to Biblical, Babylonian and Egyptian Sources," JAOS 90 [1970]: 471 n.39; Lawrence Boadt, Ezekiel's Oracles Against Egypt: A Literary and Philological Study of Ezekiel 29–32 [Biblica et Orientalia 37; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1980], 85). However, this seems unnecessarily subtle and takes no account of the rebreaking of the good arm. It is better to see these as two separate defeats for Egypt, one past and one future.
- 3. The NIV follows the MT and versions and reads "Assyria," a reading defended by Greenberg (Ezekiel 21–37, 637). In each of these word pictures of Ezekiel, however, the object of the oracle is first described in glorious terms and then brought low, which makes the oracle more appropriately directed at Egypt. The reference to Assyria presumably came in through a miswriting of t° aššûr, "cypress," or possibly of a misreading of a variant form (Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 122). The difference in overall interpretation of the passage is slight: either Pharaoh is being compared to Assyria, the great tree that flourished and was cut down, or Pharaoh is directly compared to a mighty tree that flourished and was cut down.
- 4. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:146.
- 5. Rather than NIV's "thick foliage" (see comments on Ezek. 19:11).
- 6. The NIV's "the earth below" is a misleading translation of 'ereş taḥtît; it is clearly part of the underworld, perhaps even the lowest part.
- 7. Sheol is often described as the home of all who die, hence the frequent English translation "the grave." This is not strictly accurate. Though in the Old Testament the godly may fear being abandoned by God to Sheol (Ps. 88:3), nowhere is a righteous man actually said to have gone down into Sheol. Perhaps the contrast between the fate of the righteous and the unrighteous after death is most clearly evident in Ps. 49, where those who trust in themselves are destined for Sheol (49:14), while the psalmist expects something different for himself. What that "something" is may not always be clear in the Old Testament, but in several places there is evidence of such a hope. On Sheol, see Philip S. Johnston, The Underworld and the Dead in the Old Testament (Ph.D. diss.; Cambridge Univ., 1993).
- 8. The root $d\bar{a}m\hat{a}$ ("to be like") does not normally occur in the Niphal; most translations assume a reflexive sense for it "you consider yourself like . . ." (Boadt, Ezekiel's Oracles, 129). $d\bar{a}m\hat{a}$ ("be cut off, destroyed") does occur in the Niphal, however, and there may well be a play on words here: "You consider yourself a lion of the nations" sounds exactly like "you are destroyed, O lion of the nations."
- 9. The description of Egypt as "uncircumcised" is a theological rather than literal assessment. Like the Edomites and Sidonians, it appears that the Egyptians practiced circumcision (Jack M. Sasson, "Circumcision in the Ancient Near East," JBL 85 [1966]: 473–76). However, from Ezekiel's perspective, though they may have been physically circumcised, in God's eyes they remained "uncircumcised."
- 10. See Daniel I. Block, "Beyond the Grave: Ezekiel's Vision of Death and the Afterlife," BBR 2 (1992): 113-41.

- 1. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 153.
- 2. Here we should think of pālit as a "survivor" rather than a "fugitive." It probably referred to someone surviving the fall of Jerusalem (Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:192), rather than someone who had escaped deportation by the Babylonian forces (Stuart, Ezekiel, 315). Why should someone in the latter category make the arduous journey to Babylonia on his own, to the very place to which the Babylonians wished to deport him? As Clements puts it: "No right minded survivor would have sought refuge in the enemy homeland" (Ezekiel, 147).
- 3. Taylor, Ezekiel, 213.
- 4. Or perhaps "eating over blood," a proscribed form of divination (Greenberg, Ezekiel 21-37, 684).
- 5. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 153.
- 6. They are perhaps (stereo)typified by the three main characters in Douglas Coupland's book Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture (New York: St. Martin's, 1991). These are described on the back of the book as having "been handed a society priced beyond their means. Twentysomethings, brought up with divorce, Watergate and Three Mile Island, and scarred by the 80's fallout of yuppies, recession, crack and Ronald Reagan, they represent the new lost generation—Generation X."

- 7. Jock McGregor: "Generation X: The 'Lost' Generation?" L'Abri Lectures 11 (Summer 1997). See also Stanley Grenz, A Primer on Postmodernism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996), 13.
- 8. Life After God (New York: Pocket Books, 1994), 178.
- 9. Human Nature in Its Fourfold State, 277.

- 1. Lorenz Dürr, Ursprung und Ausbau der israelitisch-jüdischen Heilandserwartung: Ein Beitrag zur Theologie des Alten Testamentes (Berlin: Schwetscke, 1925), 118–19.
- 2. Zimmerli, Ezekiel. 2:213.
- 3. Werner Lemke, "Life in the Present and Hope for the Future," Interp 38 (1984): 173 n.10.
- 4. See Joel 2:2, Zeph. 1:15 for the same phrase in the context of the Day of the Lord. See Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 162.
- 5. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 122.
- 6. Bernd Willmes, Die sogenannte Hirtenallegorie Ezekiel 34: Studien zum Bild des Hirten im AT (Beiträge zur biblischen Exegese und Theologie 19; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1984), 511.
- 7. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 292.
- 8. Jon D. Levenson, Theology, 86.
- 9. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:219; Ralph W. Klein, Ezekiel: The Prophet and His Message (Columbia, S.C.: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1988), 241.
- 10. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 47.
- 11. J. David Pleins, "From the Stump of Jesse: The Image of King David As a Social Force in the Writings of the Hebrew Prophets," Proceedings of the Eastern Great Lakes and Midwest Bible Society 6 (1986): 162.
- 12. Greenberg notes the significance of the absence of the blessing of victory in war; the new community is now directly under divine protection, as will become clearer in Ezekiel 38–39 (Ezekiel 21–37, 707).
- 13. The text of Ezek. 34:31 has aroused some suspicion since 'ādām ("people") is absent from the original text of the Septuagint. It is normally read as a clumsy secondary gloss, identifying the Lord's flock as being human, connecting this passage with 36:38 (Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:221). Alternatively, it has been argued that the words call attention to the depth and greatness of the divine condescension in meeting with a human being who is taken from the earth and returns to it again (Hengstenberg, Ezekiel, 305). But in the context that has just mentioned the fulfillment of the covenant with David and the Sinai covenant, might it not reasonably reach further back and affirm the restoration of the original covenant of creation, so that it is affirmed of the restored people, "You are 'Adam' and I am your God"?
- 14. Alastair V. Campbell, Rediscovering Pastoral Care (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1981), 27.
- 15. Christopher J. H. Wright, An Eye for an Eye: The Place of Old Testament Ethics Today (Downer's Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1983), 59.
- 16. Poythress, The Shadow of Christ, 72.
- 17. Thus Leith Anderson writes: "The style switch [from traditional to 'shopping center' church] moves from 'farmer,' where one person does everything, to 'rancher,' where a leader works with and through others" (*A Church for the 21*st Century: How to Bring Change to Your Church [Minneapolis: Bethany House, 1992], 178). The distinction seems to have originated with Lyle Schaller, "Looking at the Small Church: A Frame of Reference," The Christian Ministry 8 (1977).
- 18. Thomas C. Oden, Pastoral Theology: Essentials of Ministry (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983), 49.
- 19. For a voice crying out against this trend, see the countercultural vision of Eugene Peterson in "The Business of Making Saints," Leadership 18 (Spring 1997): 20–28.
- 20. Church growth books generally identify the number at which a dramatic shift in church dynamics becomes necessary as somewhere between 120 and 200. See Kent R. Hunter, Foundations for Church Growth (New Haven, Mo.: Leader, 1983), 155.
- 21. For helpful comments on how the pastor of a large church can still exercise the ministry of a pastor, see Eugene Peterson, "The Business of Making Saints," 27.

- 1. Clements, Ezekiel, 158. The question of who will possess the land given to Abraham has already been raised in 33:24–29.
- 2. Lind, Ezekiel, 281.

- 3. Bernard Gosse, "Ézéchiel 35—36:1–15 et Ézéchiel 6: La désolation de la montagne de Séir et le renouveau des montagnes d'Israël," RB 96 (1989): 511–17.
- 4. This is the NJPS translation. The NIV has "since you did not hate bloodshed . . . "; however, the oath formula with "im-lō" normally introduces a positive statement. See Joüon-Muraoka, §165.
- 5. From Ezekiel's theological perspective, there were not in actuality two lands and two nations but one. Yet the de facto situation of two separate nations was what appeared to outsiders, such as the Edomites. But this de facto situation would not persist forever, as Ezek. 37:15–23 makes clear.
- 6. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 322.
- 7. Stuart, Ezekiel, 331.
- 8. Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 173.
- 9. In that respect, it is interesting to note that King Herod, who sought so desperately to kill Jesus as a baby, was himself an Idumean, or Edomite.
- 10. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 336.
- 11. See the remarkable testimonies of those involved in the massacre recorded by Steve Saint in "Did They Have to Die?" Christianity Today 40 (Sept. 16, 1996): 20–27.

- 1. See Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 1004.
- 2. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 348.
- 3. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:247.
- 4. Lind, Ezekiel, 290.
- 5. Fairbairn, Ezekiel, 191.
- 6. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 178.
- 7. We need not see a contradiction between the "fortified" cities of Ezek. 36:35 and the "unwalled" cities of 38:11. The rhetorical contexts are entirely different. "Fortified" frequently functions as the opposite state for a city to that of "destroyed" (e.g., Isa. 25:2), while the idiom of a people living in "unwalled cities" denotes a people who live without fear of attack (Jer. 49:31). As Greenberg put it, Ezekiel was "not working to a systematic theology, but for immediate rhetorical effect" (Ezekiel 21–37, 732).
- 8. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:251.
- 9. Ezekiel's further restriction of this group to descendants of Zadok will be discussed in reference to Ezek. 44.
- 10. For a fuller discussion of the diet laws, see Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 718–36.
- 11. On this, see R. W. L. Moberly, The Old Testament of the Old Testament: Patriarchal Narratives and Mosaic Yahwism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).
- 12. See John Piper, Desiring God: Meditations of a Christian Hedonist (Portland, Ore.: Multnomah, 1986), 23–38.
- 13. John Murray comments: "No treatment of the atonement can be properly oriented that does not trace its source to the free and sovereign love of God.... God was pleased to set his invincible and everlasting love upon a countless multitude and it is the determinate purpose of this love that the atonement secures" (Redemption Accomplished and Applied [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1955], 9–10).
- 14. It can also be broken down differently, as in 1 Cor. 6:11, where the salvation experience is described as having three aspects: "You were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God." In Rom. 8:30, Paul mentions four aspects: "Those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified."
- 15. Linda L. Belleville, "'Born of Water and Spirit': John 3:5," Trinity Journal 1 (1980): 125-40.
- 16. I appreciate the fact that many thoughtful Christians will disagree with me on this point; however, the above provides a strong rationale for why many in the evangelical camp baptize their children.
- 17. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 360.
- 18. An example of this attitude within the Christian community would be Robert Schuller, whose "theology of self-esteem" defines salvation as "rescue from shame to glory" (Self Esteem: The New Reformation [Waco, Tex.: Word, 1982], 151). For Schuller, unlike Ezekiel, shame and salvation are mutually exclusive categories. A better perspective on shame and self-esteem is found in Welch, When People Are Big and God Is Small, 24–36.
- 19. Q.2 What must you know to live and die in the joy of this comfort?
 - A. Three things: first, how great my sin and misery are; second, how I am set free from my sin and misery; third, how I am to thank God for such deliverance (The Heidelberg Catechism [Grand Rapids: CRC Publications, 1989], 12).

- 1. $biq'\hat{a}$ ("valley") appears as the antonym of har in several places in the Old Testament, notably Deut. 8:7; 11:11; Ps. 104:8. For the "very high mountain" as a theological rather than geographical concept, see Levenson, Theology, 41. Intriguingly, perhaps underlining the contrast between the Babylonian $biq'\hat{a}$ and the Israelite har, the builders of the tower of Babel locate their false place of worship on the $biq'\hat{a}$ $b''eres'' sin'\bar{a}r$ ("a plain in [the land of] Shinar") in Gen. 11:2. In terms of the spiritual geography of the Old Testament, such a location is inappropriate for divine worship.
- 2. Renz, Rhetorical Function, 163.
- 3. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 374.
- 4. The word rûaḥ occurs ten times in Ezek. 37:1–14, a fact obscured by the necessity of using three different English words to translate it (wind/spirit/breath), and reference to rûaḥ in verses 1 and 14 form an inclusio.
- 5. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 104.
- 6. From the Christian side, Zimmerli cites Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius of Constantine, Ambrose, Severus, and John of Damascus (Ezekiel, 2:264). For the history of Jewish interpretation of the passage, see Greenberg, Ezekiel 21–37, 749–50.
- 7. For the scholarly consensus, see R. Martin-Achard, "Resurrection," ABD, 5:680-84.
- 8. This is merely one of a series of connections between Ezekiel and these two prophets. See Keith Carley, Ezekiel Among the Prophets (SBT 31; London: SCM, 1975), 13–47.
- 9. Miracles: A Preliminary Study (New York: Macmillan, 1963), 150.

- 1. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:273. Though the Hebrew words are different, the translators of the Septuagint rendered both by rhabdos, rod, scepter.
- 2. Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 193. Greenberg sees the choice of 'es as being due to its ambiguity, representing both king and kingdom (Ezekiel 21–37, 753).
- 3. Lind, Ezekiel, 303. Interestingly, this is the same number of times as the key word rûah occurred in 37:1–14.
- 4. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:274–75.
- 5. Compare Hos. 1:11, which speaks of Israel and Judah being reunited under one head $(r\bar{o}\vec{s})$.
- 6. The key word 'ôlām occurs five times in these verses.
- 7. See Carol Meyers, "David As Temple Builder," Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross, ed. P. D. Miller Jr., P. D. Hanson, and S. D. McBride (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987), 365–66.
- 8. See Harold Turner, From Temple to Meeting House: The Phenomenology and Theology of Places of Worship (The Hague: Mouton, 1975), 185.
- 9. To be fair, it should be admitted that in many "reformed" church buildings the pulpit was far more dominant than the communion table and the baptismal font, reflecting an unbalanced focus on the preaching of the Word to the exclusion of the other means of grace.
- 10. See "God's Plan for Reunion" in John Frame, Evangelical Reunion: Denominations and the Body of Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1991), 67–71.
- 11. It is likely that Paul has in mind the actual physical wall that divided Jew and Gentile in the Jerusalem temple in Eph. 2:14. Certainly the passage is filled with temple language, even apart from the explicit reference to the church as the new temple in Eph. 2:22. See Klyne Snodgrass, Ephesians (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996), 132–39.
- 12. Our Life in Christ (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963), 99.

- 1. Daniel I. Block, "Gog in Prophetic Tradition: A New Look at Ezekiel 38:17," VT 42 (1992): 157.
- 2. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:301.
- 3. See Herodotus, Hist. 1.8–13.
- 4. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 204.

- 5. Block fittingly describes Gog as the "archetypal enemy" (Ezekiel 25–48, 436).
- 6. This phrase has been frequently translated as "prince of Rosh" (cf. NIV note), where Rosh is understood as a place-name, ever since the time of the Septuagint. This translation is grammatically possible, but in the absence of any biblical evidence for such a place-name, it is better to see it as a hierarchical title, as in the similar examples of Num. 3:32 and 1 Chron. 7:40. See Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 20. In addition, if $r\bar{o}$'s is part of the title, then Gog rules over a seven-nation coalition, which underlines the symbolic completeness of the forces arrayed against Israel (cf. the kinds of weapons that are subsequently burned for seven years, while the burial of Gog's army takes seven months). If $r\bar{o}$'s is a place-name, however, that symbolism is lost. For the best defense of the view that $r\bar{o}$'s is a place-name, see James D. Price, "Rosh: An Ancient Land Known to Ezekiel," GTJ 6 (1985): 67–89.
- 7. Lind, Ezekiel, 315.
- 8. Allen, Ezekiel 1–19, 72.
- 9. Note that this expression too, which can also be translated (lit.) as the "heights of [Mount] Zaphon," is a theological rather than geographical description. It is a description of the mythological cosmic mountain, the home of the gods (Clifford, Cosmic Mountain, 148). In Ps. 48:2 and Isa. 14:13 the terminology is taken over and applied to the heavenly residence of the Lord; here, however, it may refer to its original signification as the home of the (pagan) gods.
- 10. So Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:288; Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 198. Both delete the interrogative $h\bar{e}$ as due to dittography, following the versions.
- 11. Block, "Gog in Prophetic Tradition," 170–72.
- 12. Lind, Ezekiel, 318.
- 13. NIV "they will forget their shame" emends the MT to $w^n n \bar{a} s \hat{u}$. The translation "they will bear their shame," attested by all the versions and the Qere, assumes that $w^n n \bar{a} s \hat{u}$ is a shortened form of $w^n n \bar{a} s \hat{u}$. The Qal of $n \bar{a} s \hat{a}$ is rare and occurs nowhere else in Ezekiel, whereas $n \bar{a} s \hat{a} k^n l m m \hat{a}$ is frequent in Ezekiel and occurs in a virtually identical context in Ezek. 16:54. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:295.
- 14. Ambrose, De fide ad Gratianum 2.16, 138. Taking an alternative view, Augustine already protested against such a specific identification of Gog and his allies with particular historical nations in The City of God 20.11.
- 15. Robert L. Wilken, The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1992), 244–45.
- 16. Bernard McGinn, Visions of the End: Apocalyptic Traditions in the Middle Ages (New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1979), 151.
- 17 Ezekiel 754
- 18. Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon, trans. S. P. Tregelles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949; reprint of 1857). The Crimean War was fought between 1853 and 1856 as France and Britain sought to prevent Russian expansionism southeast into Turkey.
- 19. Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford Univ., 1909). The view that Rosh is Russia is maintained in The New Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford Univ., 1967), though Moscow and Tobolsk are no longer mentioned.
- 20. The Prophet Ezekiel, 2d ed. (Neptune, N.J.: Loizeaux Brothers, 1972; reprint of 1918), 259.
- 21. Hal Lindsey's book The Late Great Planet Earth (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970) includes chapters entitled "Russia Is a Gog" and "The Yellow Peril." Substantially similar scenarios are depicted in Harry Ironside, Ezekiel the Prophet (Neptune, N.J.: Loizeaux Brothers, 1949), 266–67; David Egner, The Bear Goes South (Grand Rapids: Radio Bible Class, 1979); and Clarence E. Mason Jr., "Gog and Magog, Who and When?" Prophecy and the Seventies (Chicago: Moody, 1971), 221–32. It should, however, be pointed out that not all dispensationalists have accepted the identification of Rosh with Russia; see, for example, Ralph H. Alexander, "A Fresh Look at Ezekiel 38 and 39," JETS 17 (1974): 157–69; Charles L. Feinberg, The Prophecy of Ezekiel (Chicago: Moody, 1969), 220.
- 22. Edwin M. Yamauchi, Foes From the Northern Frontier: Invading Hordes From the Russian Steppes (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1982), 20.
- 23. BDB, 912c recognizes both possible translations of $r\bar{o}$'s, as a title or a country, but says of the latter "not identified"; this change is already evident in the 1906 edition. Ludwig Koehler and Walter Baumgartner, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti libros, 2d ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1958), 866a, list it as "unknown." Lindsey also cites C. F. Keil as a supporter of the view that Rosh is Russia (Late Great Planet, 65); however, though Keil does read $r\bar{o}$'s as a place-name, he describes the attempt to link it with Russia as "a doubtful conjecture" (Ezekiel, 2:160).
- 24. Edwin Yamauchi, "Meshech, Tubal, and Company: A Review Article," JETS 19 (1976): 243-45.
- 25. Yamauchi, Foes From the Northern Frontier, 51.
- 26. b. Yoma 10a.
- 27. Ephraim A. Speiser, Genesis (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962), 66.
- 28. Ellison, Ezekiel, 134.
- 29. Stephen L. Cook, Prophecy and Apocalypticism: The Postexilic Social Setting (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995), 88–96.
- 30. This phrase is perhaps significantly absent from Ezekiel 38–39. The more general "after many days" (38:8) and "in that day" (38:18; cf. 39:11) do not carry the same eschatological weight (Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 428).

- 31. These are not true "apocalypses," however, since many key features are missing. Particularly striking is the fact that in almost all of these Hollywood scenarios the desired goal of the intervention by the [human] savior figure is not the radical transformation of our existence but simply the preservation of the American way of life. Thus in the recent movies Armageddon and Deep Impact, the savior figures sacrifice themselves in destroying the asteroids that threaten the earth simply to enable life to carry on much as before, symbolized in the latter film by the reconstruction of the Capitol building in Washington, D.C.
- 32. "The issues raised by the Terminator movies are the issues explored by Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. How is humankind to avoid extinction. . .?" (Gaye Ortiz and Maggie Roux, "The Terminator Movies: Hi-Tech Holiness and the Human Condition," in Explorations in Theology and Film, ed. Clive Marsh and Gaye Ortiz [Oxford: Blackwell, 1997], 142).
- 33. In addition to the initials of Connor's name, calling his mother "Sarah" evokes the Old Testament mother of the promised child, further inviting us to explore the religious dimensions of the film.
- 34. See Ulrich H. J. Körtner, The End of the World, trans. D. W. Stott (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1995), 1.
- 35. Disappointment With God (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988), 181.
- 36. Ibid., 174.
- 37. Joni Eareckson Tada, "A Stone Cold Fact," Moody Monthly 98 (May/June 1998): 71. See also John Kramp, "Spiritual Search and Rescue: The Effort We Make Reflects Our Sense of Urgency," Moody Monthly 97 (May/June 1997): 18–19.

- 1. Note that the year of liberation is explicitly mentioned in 46:17, and the number twenty-five and its multiples occur frequently in the dimensions of the temple. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:346. Medieval Jewish commentators also linked the date with the Jubilee year but in a different way, arguing that the "thirtieth year" of Ezek. 1 was the thirtieth year since the last Jubilee. Since the thirtieth year was also the fifth year of the prophet's exile (1:2), then the twenty-fifth year of the prophet's exile must be the Jubilee year. See Abraham J. Rosenberg, Ezekiel: A Translation of Text, Rashi and Commentary (New York: Judaica, 1991), 2:342.
- 2. Levenson, Theology, 39.
- 3. Ibid., 40.
- 4. Ibid., 42.
- 5. Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 515.
- 6. Kalinda R. Stevenson, The Vision of Transformation: The Territorial Rhetoric of Ezekiel 40–48 (SBLDS 154; Atlanta: Scholars, 1996), 19.
- 7. According to Yigael Yadin, these gates were roughly seventy feet deep by twenty feet wide. See Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:352–55.
- 8. Steven S. Tuell, The Law of the Temple in Ezekiel 40-48 (HSM 49; Atlanta: Scholars, 1992), 59.
- 9. So Stuart, Ezekiel, 372.
- 10. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:355; Stuart, Ezekiel, 375.
- 11. Vision of Transformation, 44.
- 12. "Burnt offerings" ('\(\bar{o}\)lost) here and in Ezek. 40:42 appear to represent all the sacrificial offerings that would be made (Allen, \(Exekiel 20-48, 230\)).
- 13. MT has liškôt šārîm ("rooms for the singers"). The NIV follows most commentators in emending to liškôt setayim ("two rooms"), on the basis of the LXX.
- 14. This passage, along with others that refer to the Zadokites, has frequently been assigned by commentators to a separate "Zadokite stratum." However, the evidence does not support such "stratification." See Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 87–90.
- 15. Stevenson points out the predominance of square shapes in the realm of the holy and their absence in the profane areas (Vision of Transformation, 42). Similarly, as you move toward the center of the tabernacle, the spaces become progressively more square until you reach the Most Holy Place, which is a perfect cube. See Menahem Haran, Temples and Temple Service in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1978), 152.
- 16. Zimmerli locates the altar off-center, in front of the temple building, as a mark of the temple building being the center of gravity of the whole (Ezekiel, 2:355). However, comparison with Haran's diagram of the tabernacle (Temple Service, 152) encourages locating it in the center of the inner court. In that structure, even though the altar is not the "center of gravity" (that privilege belongs to the ark of the covenant), it still sits at the center of the courtyard.
- 17. The total number of steps is, not coincidentally, twenty-five (Allen, Ezekiel 20–48, 235).
- 18. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 27.
- 19. Moshe Greenberg, "The Design and Themes of Ezekiel's Program of Restoration" Interp 38 (1984): 193.

- 20. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:380.
- 21. Greenberg, "Design and Themes," 193.
- 22. See Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 637.
- 23. Ibid., 447-52.
- 24. The examples are from Thomas, God Strengthens, 267; Peter C. Craigie, Ezekiel (Daily Study Bible; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983), 278.
- 25. Feinberg, Ezekiel, 242; Ironside, Ezekiel, 284.
- 26. The absence of specified building materials is a particular problem for literal interpretation, since these are precisely described in other situations where God instructs his servants to construct such edifices as the tabernacle and Solomon's temple. Of course, it should also be noted that Ezekiel is not instructed to build anything; he merely has to observe and recount to his fellow exiles what he has seen. The building he sees is already in existence.
- 27. If indeed the site in Jerusalem is intended. See below on the division of the land in chapters 47–48 on the problems that are posed there for a "literal" interpretation.
- 28. Susan Niditch, "Ezekiel 40–48 in a Visionary Context," CBQ 48 (1986): 216.
- 29. Ibid., 221.
- 30. The image comes from Katheryn P. Darr, "The Wall Around Paradise," VT 37 (1987): 271–79, though her concern is rather with the (invisible) wall around the new Promised Land than the (very concrete) wall surrounding Ezekiel's temple.
- 31. Note that Haggai, writing after the Exile, refers to priestly clothing as having a noncontagious holiness (Hag. 2:12), whereas in Ezekiel's vision the priests' clothes can transmit holiness (Ezek. 44:19). A higher standard of precautions is therefore necessary in the design of Ezekiel's temple.
- 32. For a rich development of this theme, see Edmund P. Clowney, "The Final Temple," WTJ 35 (1972): 166–77.
- 33. Ibid., 177.
- 34. Robert W. Bly, The Sibling Society (San Francisco: Perseus, 1996).
- 35. Kimberly Costello, cited in Rob Owen, Gen X TV, 11.

- 1. A similar pattern has been observed in the construction of the tabernacle. See Frank H. Gorman Jr., The Ideology of Ritual: Space, Time and Status in the Priestly Theology (JSOTS 91; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990), 48.
- 2. This also means that it travels along the east-west spine of the temple, a line of special sanctity in Ezekiel's temple (Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 578).
- 3. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 50. It may be, however, that the identification of the entire temple rather than the ark as the Lord's footstool represents once again a raising of the standards of holiness compared with the older traditions.
- 4. NIV translates the Heb. phrase used here as "the lifeless idols of their kings." Various translations of this phrase have been defended in recent literature. The RSV takes it as a literal reference to the corpses of the kings (so also Elizabeth Bloch-Smith, Judahite Burial Practices and Beliefs About the Dead [JSOTS 123; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992], 116). Jürgen H. Ebach argued for their identification as offerings for the dead ("PGR = (Toten-)Opfer," UF 3 (1971): 365–68. However, the majority opinion has continued to accept D. Neiman's older view that these were memorial stelae erected in honor of the earthly king ("PGR: A Canaanite Cult Object in the Old Testament," JBL 67 [1948]: 55–60). See now the discussion in Theodore J. Lewis, Cults of the Dead in Ancient Israel and Ugarit (HSM 39; Atlanta: Scholars, 1989), 141.
- 5. NIV follows the MT in reading $b\bar{a}m\hat{o}t\bar{a}m$ ("their high places"). However, this introduces a separate location for their idolatry in a context that seems centered around the temple mount. It seems better to revocalize with a number of Hebrew manuscripts and read $b^e m\hat{o}t\bar{a}m$ ("at their death").
- On the relationship of the terms melek ("king") and nās î" ("prince") in Ezekiel, see Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel.
- 7. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 18–19.
- 8. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 452. The overall tabernacle complex was not a square, as Ezekiel's temple was, but rather two adjoining squares, one comprising the inner court and the other the outer court.
- 9. J. Gordon McConville, "Priests and Levites in Ezekiel: A Crux in the Interpretation of Israel's History," TynBul 34 (1983): 28.
- 10. NIV translates "sin offering" following the older terminology. However, the purpose of the haṭṭā't is not the forgiveness of sins but rather the purification of a place. For the terminology and the purpose of the haṭṭā't, see Milgrom, Leviticus I—16, 253–61.
- 11. Ezekiel, 2:433.

- 12. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 191.
- 13. Baruch Levine, Leviticus (JPS Torah Commentary; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989), 23.
- 14. Behind all of the Old Testament shadows lies a heavenly reality, a reality that in Christ has now come down from heaven to earth, ushering in the New Testament epoch. For a fuller outworking of this principle, see Geerhardus Vos, The Teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956), 55–65.
- 15. Peter Jones, Spirit Wars: Pagan Revival in Christian America (Mukilteo, Wash.: Wine Press, 1997), 26–29.
- 16. The God Who Is There (Chicago: InterVarsity, 1968).
- 17. Holy Sonnets, xiv.

- 1. Greenberg, "Design and Themes," 194.
- 2. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 451.
- 3. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 133–39.
- 4. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 121.
- 5. Julius Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel, trans. J. S. Black and A. Menzies (New York: Meridian Library, 1957), 121–51.
- 6. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 127-29; Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 76.
- 7. Jacob Milgrom, Studies in Levitical Terminology 1: The Encroacher and the Levite; The Term 'aboda (Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1970), 8–10.
- 8. Compare the NJPS translation, which places the paragraph break after Ezek. 44:8. See Rodney K. Duke, "Punishment or Restoration: Another Look at the Levites of Ezekiel 44:6–16," JSOT 40 (1988): 65.
- 9. Cooke, Ezekiel, 481.
- 10. See my Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 79-80.
- 11. Ibid., 82.
- 12. Stevenson describes this as the genre of "territorial rhetoric" (Vision of Transformation, 11–13).
- 13. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 640.
- 14. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, 978–85.
- 15. It is not so much letting the hair grow long (NIV) as letting it hang uncared for, as in 24:17, 23 (Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:460).
- 16. Midrashic sources claimed that alcohol abuse was a factor in the deaths of Nadab and Abihu. See Pesiq. Rab Kah. 26:9; Midr. Lev. Rab. 20:9.
- 17. Where these laws differ from the Pentateuchal provisions, Ezekiel seems to be universally more stringent (Skinner, Ezekiel, 438).
- 18. Moshe Weinfeld, "The Covenant of Grant in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East," JAOS 90 (1970): 184–205.
- 19. On the sociological function of these stories, see Smith, Religion of the Landless, 162-64.
- 20. Anthony A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), 263.
- 21. Joseph A. Conforti, Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement: Calvinism, the Congregational Ministry and Reform in New England Between the Great Awakenings (Grand Rapids: Christian Univ. Press, 1981), 120. This view of Hopkins represents a conscious distancing from the view of Jonathan Edwards, cited below.
- 22. C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain, 145.
- 23. Darrell L. Bock, Luke (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996), 488.
- 24. Thus there is something fundamentally sub-Christian about the popular old gospel song by Ira Stamphill, "I've Got a Mansion Just Over the Hilltop." This song asserts "I'm satisfied with just a cottage below / A little silver and a little gold / But in that city where the ransomed will shine / I want a gold one that's silver lined." It is striking that in the entire description of the joys of heaven in this song, God is not even mentioned!
- 25. Cited in Conforti, Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement, 121.
- 26. "Communion with God," Select Letters of John Newton (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1960 reprint), 34.

- 1. The unit of measure is unexpressed throughout this passage, except for the buffer zone around the sanctuary, which is explicitly 50 cubits. The KJV inserted "reeds," on the basis of Ezek. 42:16–20, which identified the temple as 500 reeds square, but which has text-critical problems of its own. The overall description of the temple dimensions in chs. 40–42 seems predicated on the basis of a temple complex 500 cubits square. This makes the entire central portion about 8 miles square (25,000 cubits by 25,000 cubits). If the dimensions are in reeds, the central square is closer to 50 miles by 50 miles, which would leave virtually no land on either side for the prince before you arrive at the Mediterranean on the west and the Jordan on the east.
- 2. According to the NIV, which follows the Septuagint. The MT gives 25,000 by 10,000, restricting this "sacred district" to that occupied by the priests. Whichever is original, the difference is not merely the result of a visual error but of an exegetical difference over whether this refers to the inner, priestly portion, or includes the parallel strip assigned to the Levites. In favor of the Septuagint, 45:3 seems to suggest that the priestly area comprises only one part of the "sacred district," and 48:20 suggests that the overall 25,000 square is made up of the sacred area and the 5,000 by 25,000 strip assigned to the city. In favor of the MT, see Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 31–32.
- 3. E. G. King, "The Prince in Ezekiel," Old Testament Student 5 (1885): 115.
- 4. The arrangement of the levitical and priestly strips is not given explicitly, causing some to argue that the sequence moves from north to south (priestly portion, levitical portion, city portion; e.g., Cameron M. Mackay, "Why Study Ezekiel 40–48," EvQ 37 [1965]: 161; Greenberg, "Design and Themes," 202). If, however, the motion is from the inside outward, as in the tour of the temple, then the priestly portion would be in the center, flanked on the north by the levitical portion and on the south by the city portion. Given the importance of geometric center in the square design of Ezekiel's temple, it seems most probable that the temple is located at the geometric center of the sacred portion.
- 5. This may be the only equitable way of distributing the land among the twelve tribes, given the topography of the Promised Land, as Greenberg asserts ("Idealism and Practicality in Numbers 35:4–5 and Ezekiel 48," JAOS 88 [1968]: 59–66). However, it is theology, not practicality, that is driving the division.
- 6. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 107-8.
- 7. Menahem Haran, "The Law-Code of Ezekiel 40–48 and Its Relation to the Priestly School," HUCA 50 (1979): 57.
- 8. See the discussion of the centrality of these features in Ezekiel 43.
- 9. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 667.
- 10. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:486.
- 11. Here 'am hā'āres seems to denote the entire worshiping community. See my Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 120–21.
- 12. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:490.
- 13. Dennis J. McCarthy, Treaty and Covenant (AnBib 21a; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1981), 57.
- 14. Of course, given the permanently closed east gate of the outer court and the absence of any gate on the west, this is the only axis on which a procession through the temple can take place. Elsewhere, however, processions tend to be to or around sacred objects rather than through them (Ps. 26:6; 42:4; 68:24; cf. Neh. 12:37–43), and it seems to me that there is more at stake in this verse than mere "traffic control."
- 15. Tryggve N. D. Mettinger, Solomonic State Officials: A Study of the Civil Government Officials of the Israelite Monarchy (Lund: Gleerup, 1971), 80–110.
- 16. From the outside to the center (40:5–41:4); from the center to the outside (41:5–42:20); from the outside to the center (43:1–5); and from the center to the outside (43:13–46:24).
- 17. b. Šabb. 13b.
- 18. So Rashi, Ezekiel, 2.406.
- 19. b. Menah 45a.
- 20. The Scofield Reference Bible, 908; Feinberg, Ezekiel, 234.
- 21. As is pointed out by fellow dispensationalist Jerry M. Hullinger ("The Problem of Animal Sacrifices in Ezekiel 40–48," BibSac 152 [1995]: 280). Hullinger's own proposal is that the sacrifices achieve genuine "atonement" in the sense of purgation, protecting the restored sancta from accumulations of impurity. While this treatment is more sensitive to the significance of the various different sacrifices in the levitical system, it is doubtful that it is an adequate solution to the problem since Hebrews presents Christ's once-for-all sacrifice as the ultimate and definitive purgation (Heb. 9:12–14). If Christ has effectively cleansed the heavenly tabernacle once and for all, it is hard to see how there can be earthly repetitions of that purgation that do not detract from it. It is striking that The New Scofield Reference Bible at least allows the possibility that the sacrifices may not be intended "to be taken literally, in view of the putting away of such offerings, but is rather to be regarded as a presentation of the worship of redeemed Israel, in her own land and in a millennial temple, using the terms with which the Jews were familiar in Ezekiel's day" (888). No explanation is advanced of what this "nonliteral" sacrificial worship might look like.
- 22. Stuart, Ezekiel, 400; Willem VanGemeren, Interpreting the Prophetic Word (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), 336.
- 23. Thomas, God Strengthens, 287; Feinberg, Ezekiel, 257.
- 24. Greenberg, "Design and Themes," 208; Steven Tuell, "The Temple Vision of zekiel 40–48: A Program for Restoration," Proceedings of the Eastern Great Lakes Biblical Society 2 (1982): 96.

- 25. Daniel I. Block, "Bringing Back David," in The Lord's Anointed: Interpretation of Old Testament Messianic Texts, ed. P. E. Satterthwaite, R. S. Hess, and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995), 181.
- 26. Samson H. Levey, The Messiah: An Aramaic Interpretation: The Messianic Exegesis of the Targum (Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College, 1974), xix.
- 27. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 55-56.
- 28. John Taylor is at least interested in asking that question, even if his answer ("It illustrates the fact that in ancient Israel no less than today liturgical experimentation was demanded by new situations") fails to convince (Ezekiel, 275).
- 29. Similarly the new re-creation in Ezek. 37 results not in the formation of one new man but an entire army!
- 30. Thus Gen. 1 involves three basic elements: forming the spaces (days 1–3), filling the spaces with occupants (days 4–6), and ordering time itself (the framework of "days"). On the priestly concern with the ordering of time, see Philip P. Jenson, Graded Holiness: A Key to the Priestly Conception of the World (JSOTS 106; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992), 182–209.
- 31. The first three elements are from Roland de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1965), 451–54. The fourth expresses the essence of the sin offering (haṭṭāʾt).
- 32. Block, Ezekiel 25-48, 686.

- Raymond Dillard and Tremper Longman III, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994), 327.
- 2. Gwilym H. Jones, 1 & 2 Kings (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984), 184.
- 3. See Day, God's Conflict With the Dragon and the Sea.
- 4. For this as a theme in Ezekiel, see the comments on Ezekiel 1.
- 5. Wenham, "Sanctuary Symbolism," 402.
- 6. The fact that the prophet is instructed to measure the river at four different points is probably not coincidental (Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:512).
- 7. Ibid., 2:514.
- 8. Clifford, Cosmic Mountain, 49-51.
- 9. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:515.
- 10. D. Ralph Davis, "The Kingdom of God in Transition: Interpreting 2 Kings 2," WTJ 46 (1984): 390–91. In this covenant context, the use of salt by Elisha in "healing the waters" perhaps takes on a more transparent significance as a key ingredient in covenant renewal ceremonies.
- 11. Thus the distinction between "universal" versus "national" restoration, drawn by Darr, is not quite accurate ("Wall Around Paradise," 271–79). Certainly the restoration is not universal in scope, but it is more than simply ethnic-national: It encompasses all who are part of God's renewed people.
- 12. In his book Slouching Toward Gomorrah: Modern Liberalism and American Decline (New York: Regan, 1996), Robert Bork describes the danger presented to society by the trend toward unbridled antinomianism in our era: "Our modern, virtually unqualified, enthusiasm for liberty forgets that liberty can only be 'the space between the walls,' the walls of morality and law based upon morality. It is sensible to argue about how far apart the walls should be set, but it is cultural suicide to demand all space and no walls" (p. 65).
- 13. See Timothy Keller, "Preaching Morality in an Amoral Age: How Can You Blow the Whistle When People Don't Believe There Are Rules?" Leadership 17 (1996): 110–15, and "Preaching Hell in a Tolerant Age: Brimstone for the Broadminded," Leadership 18 (1997): 42–48.

- 1. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48, 285.
- 2. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 151.
- 3. Numbers 34 names this location Kadesh Barnea. Ezekiel's choice of name recalls the rebellion that took place there during the desert wanderings, when the Lord provided water for his rebellious people from the rock (Num. 20:13). It is not coincidental that Ezekiel has just described the river of life flowing out of the temple to provide for Israel's needs.
- 4. The order in which the boundaries are listed is different in the two accounts: Ezekiel starts in the north and moves counterclockwise to the eastern, southern, and western boundaries, while Numbers starts in the south and moves counterclockwise from there. In addition, Numbers gives most detail to the southern boundary markers while Ezekiel is most precise in the north. Steven Tuell argues that the difference between them is essentially one of perspective: The account in Numbers views the land from an Egyptian perspective, while Ezekiel's description is that of the Persian or Assyrian authorities (Law of the Temple, 155–56).

- 5. Block, Ezekiel 25–48, 716.
- 6. G. Ch. Macholz, "Noch Einmal: Planungen für den Wiederaufbau nach der Katastrophe von 587," VT 19 (1969): 350.
- 7. Diether Kellermann, "TDOT, 2:444.
- 8. Stevenson, Vision of Transformation, 39-40.
- 9. Levenson, Theology, 116-17.
- 10. Ibid., 118.
- 11. As Cameron M. Mackay pointed out more than seventy years ago ("Ezekiel's Division of Palestine Among the Tribes," PTR 22 [1924]: 29). Most of the maps in commentaries and Bible atlases locate the sacred area further south, because they identify the "city" of the sacred reservation with Jerusalem, in spite of the fact that it is nowhere given that name in Ezekiel's vision. The result is that their diagrams depict significantly larger strips for the northern tribes than the southern tribes, although they never discuss how this can be maintained exegetically. Note, for example, the contradiction between the (correct) observation by Block that the tribal strips were all the same width (Ezekiel 25–48, 723) with the map given on p. 711, which shows the strips of the northern tribes as much wider than those of the southern tribes, while the sacred reservation turns out to be on the site of Jerusalem. Incidentally, this relocation of the temple away from Jerusalem provides another knotty problem for the dispensational view that Ezekiel's vision will literally be fulfilled in a future millennial kingdom.
- 12. So, e.g., Zimmerli, Ezekiel, 2:535. This assumes that the description of the sacred portion proceeds from the center out. Others have argued that the description of the sacred portion continues the pattern of the north-south progress of the tribal land division, which would place the levitical portion south of the priestly portion. So, for instance, Macholz, "Planungen," 335.
- 13. In ch. 45, Ezekiel had already indicated that this land will provide the resources for the prince to maintain the cult.
- 14. Levenson notes that this represents a distinct shift from tribal arrangement when Israel camped in the desert. In that arrangement (see Num. 2), the north was the least favored direction (Theology, 121).
- 15. For a similar dual image to convey complementary truths, consider the two sacrificial goats in the Day of Atonement ritual. One goat is slaughtered and its blood applied to the Most Holy Place to purify it, while the other goat has the sins of the people placed on its head and is driven off outside the camp (Lev. 16). This provides a twofold picture of atonement. On the one hand, blood is shed and presented to God, for "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (Heb. 9:22). On the other hand, a sin-laden goat is driven out of the camp into the realm of death, demonstrating the theme of Ps. 103:12: "As far as the east is from the west, so far has he removed our transgressions from us."
- 16. Jürgen H. Ebach, Kritik und Utopie: Untersuchungen zum Verhältnis vom Volk und Herrscher im Verfassungsentwurf des Ezechiel (Kap. 40–48) (Ph.D. diss.; Univ. of Hamburg, 1972), 2.
- 17. Macholz, "Planungen," 349.
- 18. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel, 140-42.
- 19. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959–1960), 1:69.
- 20. Wilken, The Land Called Holy, 48.

DANIEL

THE NIV APPLICATION COMMENTARY

From biblical text . . . to contemporary life

TREMPER LONGMAN III

DEDICATION

To Alice

Contents

General Eattor's Frejace
Author's Preface and Acknowledgements
Abbreviations
Introduction
Outline
Bibliography
Text and Commentary on Danie
Daniel 1:1–21
Daniel 2:1–49
Daniel 3:1–30
Daniel 4:1–37
Daniel 5:1–31
Daniel 6:1–28
Daniel 7:1–28
Daniel 8:1–27
Daniel 9:1–27
Daniel 10:1-11:1
Daniel 11:2–12:13
Scripture Index
Subject Index
Notes

General Editor's Preface

"In spite of present appearances, God is in control." That, Tremper Longman tells us over and over, is the core message of Daniel. What an appropriate message for Daniel's original hearers/readers. In exile in Babylon, it must have appeared to them that the great powers of the world—the Babylonians, the Medes, the Persians—were in control. By writing of his experiences as a captive Israelite who gained power in Babylon through his ability to interpret King Nebuchadnezzar's dreams, Daniel tells his compatriots that God, not a human king, is ultimately in control.

What an appropriate message for today also. When we look at our society and find overwhelming evidences of what William Bennet calls cultural decay and the Christian Coalition describes as the loss of a moral center, it is tempting to question whether God really is in control. Perhaps we are sophisticated enough to know that human kingdoms are not in control. The failure of Maoist China, the breakup of the Soviet Union, the steep decline in the fortunes of the United States—all impress on us daily that nations and states rise and fall. Still, we tend to see behind such misfortune powers that are anything but godlike—impersonal forces of fate, theories of deterministic science, Satan the master of evil. Can God possibly be in control?

Daniel said—and would say today were he with us—yes. In spite of present appearances, God is in control. Since this is the universal message of this book, the one that bridges the sixth century B.C. and twenty-first century A.D. contexts, it is worth our while to see how Daniel goes about convincing suffering readers of this hope-giving truth. He uses a two-pronged approach. He tells us six gripping stories of God's providence, then gives us five mystical visions, which together blast our senses with impressions of God's great power. Why this combination of literal historical stories and mystical visions?

Recently I sat by Long Lake in Mercer, Wisconsin, observing a loon feeding in the bay. At least I assume the loon was feeding. The bird would bob and float on the top of the water for some seconds, then suddenly dive, stay under water for two or three minutes, and then resurface, sometimes hundreds of feet from the diving point. My observation of the loon was of a series of lake-top appearances. But to understand fully the whole meaning of those lake-top appearances, I had to infer what the bird was doing on the long dives that filled the intervals.

The book of Daniel is doing something similar. The historical stories of how God took care of the prophet as he navigated the tricky waters of Babylonian court politics are necessary to show us that God really does take care of his own. God is in control. Not in some meaningless, abstract, pie-in-the-sky way, but in the here and now.

But stories like this have their limitations. God's providence does not always show itself in "success" stories. Sometimes, as the book of Job attests, God is in control in cases where his children suffer mightily. "Success" stories are necessary to give us hope, but alone they tend to reify transitory elements of the stories—Daniel succeeded because he was a vegetarian, so if we all become vegetarians, we will succeed too. Daniel succeeded because he prayed in an upper room in full view of all the people of Babylon, so if we all pray in that manner we will succeed too. Not really. These stories are not irrelevant. They teach us important lessons. But they are like the appearances of the loon on top of the lake. In order to be fully understood, we must know that a great deal is happening under the surface.

Enter the apocalyptic visions, which communicate to us that a great deal is happening "under water." God's greatness can be illustrated through everyday stories but cannot be captured by them. We need something further to show us that God encompasses the ordinary and the everyday but also goes beyond it. Daniel's visions can be understood up to a point, but cannot be completely understood in all details. They are specifically designed to communicate mystery. They leave us uncertain about specifics even though they clearly tell us that God is in control.

Daniel's message about God's control requires both the stories of the first six chapters and the visions of the last six. The stories give us comfort, the visions a sense of our finitude. Without the latter, the stories could lead us to believe in a false relationship between human works and God's grace—if we do certain things, God must provide. Without the stories, the visions could lead us to an impractical, disembodied mysticism. With both, this book offers a hopeful confidence that God is indeed in control.

Author's Preface and Acknowledgments

THE BOOK OF DANIEL attracted my attention very early in my Christian life. As a college student in the turbulent 1970s, I was captivated by the book's vision of a violent end to history. Calmer times led to a more sober assessment of the purpose of the book, but I have never lost the thrill of reading Daniel's dramatic word pictures of the intrusion of God into the world as warrior and judge. If anything, the impact of the book has grown on me as I now see more clearly that those "simple" stories of the first half have such startling relevance for us as we struggle to come to terms with a hostile culture.

I have many people to thank for help in the composition of this book. During the past dozen years I have taught a doctoral-level seminar on the book of Daniel. Class discussions helped me sharpen my thinking about the book. For this reason, I would like to express my thanks to the students who participated in these classes. In particular, I thank Erick Allen, Mark DiGiasomo, and Jovanni Tricerri for their invaluable help as my research assistants.

This book is not the first that I have published with Zondervan. Through the years, my respect for Zondervan has grown enormously. In regard to this project, I thank Jack Kuhatschek and Verlyn Verbrugge for their insights and professionalism. I have also received excellent and insightful feedback from Terry Muck, the general editor of the series, and from John Walton of Moody Bible Institute. This volume is much better because of their critical interaction. I must say, however, that since I did not always follow their advice, they cannot be blamed for any shortcomings.

This book is dedicated to my wife, Alice, on the occasion of our twenty-fifth wedding anniversary.

—Tremper Longman III
Westmont College

Abbreviations

AB Anchor Bible

ANET Ancient Near Eastern Texts, ed. J. Pritchard

AusBR Australian Biblical Review

AUSS Andrews University Seminary Studies

BA Biblical Archaeologist

BAR Biblical Archaeology Review

BASOR Bulletin of the American School of Oriental Research

Bib Biblica

BSac Bibliotheca Sacra

BT The Bible Translator

CBQ Catholic Biblical Quarterly

CBQMS Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series

ConBOT Coniectanca biblica, Old Testament

CT Christianity Today

EBC Expositor's Bible Commentary

ETL Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses

EvQ Evangelical Quarterly

ExpTim Expository Times

GTJ Grace Theological Journal

HDR Harvard Dissertations in Religion

HUCA Hebrew Union College Annual

ICC International Critical Commentary

IEJ Israel Exploration Journal

Interp Interpretation

IOS Israel Oriental Society

JA Journal asiatique

JANES Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society

JAOS Journal of the American Oriental Society

JBL Journal of Biblical Literature

JETS Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society

JMRS Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies

JNES Journal of Near Eastern Studies

JQR Jewish Quarterly Review

JSJ Journal for the Study of Judaism

JSNT Journal for the Study of the New Testament

JSOT Journal for the Study of the Old Testament

JSOTSup Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series

JSPSS Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha Supplement Series

JTS Journal of Theological Studies

NAB New American Bible

NAC New American Commentary

NICOT New International Commentary on the Old Testament

NIDOTTE New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis, ed. W. VanGemeren

NIV New International Version

NJB New Jerusalem Bible

NLT New Living Translation

NovT Novum Testamentum

NRSV New Revised Standard Version

NTS New Testament Studies

OTL Old Testament Library

REB Revised English Bible

SBLDS Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series

ST Studia theologica

TOTC Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries

TrinJ Trinity Journal

TynBul Tyndale Bulletin

TZ Theologische Zeitschrift

VT Vetus Testamentum

WBC Word Biblical Commentary

WO Die Welt des Orients

WTJ Westminster Theological Journal

ZAW Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft

Introduction to Daniel

Daniel is a Book of paradoxes. The first six chapters are deceptively simple stories of faith under pressure. Daniel and his three friends have been forced to leave their homeland, Israel, and settle in the Babylonian king's palace. They are compelled to learn foreign ways in preparation to serve the government, which has made a hostile incursion against Israel and looms dangerously over that country of their birth. Each chapter brings new challenges, and each time they rise to meet the crisis. Neither Daniel nor his three friends waver in their faith or ponder their actions. They certainly seek divine help, but they are confident in their God, even if God might not preserve their lives through a trial (cf. 3:16–18). God, however, is up to the task, demonstrating his sovereignty, his power over evil human intentions, again and again. Clear and encouraging, these six stories have spoken forcefully to many believers, including the youngest of children. Many of us who grew up in the church remember the stories of Daniel as a staple of children's Sunday school programs and vacation Bible school lessons.

Not so with the second half of the book, however! The simple division between chapters 6 and 7 masks a radical shift in genre and complexity. While children resonate with the lessons of Daniel 1–6, seasoned Bible scholars scratch their heads over Daniel 7–12 with the move from simple stories to obscure apocalyptic visions (see description and discussion of apocalyptic at the beginning of the commentary on chapter 7). The first half of the book are stories about Daniel; the second half are visions of Daniel. Even though there is a dramatic contrast in genre between the two halves of the book, however, the overall message of the book is uniform: In spite of present appearances, God is in control.

The Sovereignty of God

THE BIBLE IS a book about God. Daniel is no exception; it too is a book about God. We emphasize this at the beginning because the focus of the camera, to use a film analogy, is often on the human characters: Daniel, the three friends, Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Darius, Cyrus. But we must not be misled; Daniel's main function is to reveal God to us, the readers.

The Bible, however, is not interested in presenting its readers with an abstract understanding of the nature of God. We have little in the Bible that resembles modern systematic theology; certainly there is no listing and description of his attributes. God reveals himself in relationship with his people. We can see this in the dominant metaphors of God in the Bible. He is king, warrior, shepherd, husband, father, and mother, assuming that his people are his subjects, his soldiers, his sheep, his wife, his children.² As we will see, the book of Daniel utilizes some of these metaphors of relationship in support of the overall theme of divine sovereignty, but here I wish to draw attention to the fact that his sovereignty is not described abstractly in this book, but in the midst of the historical process, in the nitty-gritty of life.

We can anticipate fuller treatments by simply mentioning the first few verses of chapter 1, where we see that it is really God, not Nebuchadnezzar, who is behind the Babylonian's assertion of power over Judah. It is God, not Nebuchadnezzar and his educational and dietary regime, who is behind the extraordinary skills of Daniel and his three friends. It is God who is behind Daniel's ability to penetrate the secret of Nebuchadnezzar's dream in chapter 2. Each chapter tells a different story, but each one is a story of divine sovereignty.

God is all-powerful, and this narration and demonstration of his power has one important purpose: the encouragement of a beleaguered people. Faithful Israelites must have suffered in exile as they remembered the good relationship that they as a people had with their God in the land of Palestine. They must have suffered as they were forced to work for the good of the nation that oppressed them. And they did suffer as they found themselves in situations where they were pressed to compromise or else face dire consequences. The message of Daniel that God is all-powerful and in control in spite of present conditions intended to present a powerful encouragement to these people.

But who were these people? Who were Daniel's original audience? And, for that matter, who was Daniel himself? These questions lead us into the midst of one of the thorniest questions of the book.

Daniel and Its Original Audience

THE BOOK OF Daniel sets Daniel in the sixth century B.C. There is no doubt or dispute about that. Major figures from this time period, known from other biblical and ancient Near Eastern sources, play an important role in the book: Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Cyrus, as well as Jehoiakim. Daniel 1:1 is dated to the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim (605 B.C.) and the latest references include one to the "first year of King Cyrus" (1:21; 539 B.C.) as well as that great king's third year (10:1; 537 B.C.).

Details of this period as they relate to the text will be given at the appropriate place. However, briefly, the sixth century was a crucial moment for God's people and an interesting epoch in the history of the ancient Near East. In terms of the latter, the beginning of the book of Daniel coincides with Babylon's rise on the dust of the Assyrian empire. Nebuchadnezzar's incursions into Palestine from his command center in Riblah, Syria, coincide with Babylon's bid to push Egyptian power out of the region. Under Nebuchadnezzar, Babylon grew stronger and stronger and reached the height of its power. After his death, that power slowly dissipated, though there were interesting moments under such rulers (not named in the book of Daniel) as Neriglissar and Nabonidus (for the latter's association with Belshazzar, see comments on Dan. 5). On the horizon lurked the developing power known as Persia, beginning in the middle of the sixth century to expand its imperial pretensions. Under Cyrus Persia finally took Babylon in 539 B.C.

With this crucial date we can turn to the story of Israel, more specifically the southern kingdom of Judah, in the sixth century. The year 539 B.C. was an important one for God's people because with the ascension of Persian power came a change of policy toward subjugated peoples. While the Babylonians exiled the leaders of captured peoples like the Judeans to utilize their skills and resources at the center of the empire, the Persians felt it better to return these people to their homeland. The exile from which the Israelites returned in 539 B.C. began in earnest in 587/586 B.C., though earlier incursions are documented in 597 and, as we argue in the commentary on Daniel 1:1–3, in 605 B.C.

Of course, the setting of material like what we have in Daniel 1–6 does no more than give us the earliest date for the composition of the book. Nowhere do these chapters claim that Daniel or anyone else wrote them.

There is no claim for a sixth-century date of the book. They are accounts about the sixth century, not necessarily compositions of the sixth century.

The same may be said of the last six chapters of the book, but here there is a wrinkle. As mentioned above, these chapters contain prophecies by Daniel. The prophecies are recounted in the first person, but note that there is a third person frame. For example, the second section begins: "In the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had a dream, and visions passed through his mind as he was lying on his bed. He wrote down the substance of his dream. Daniel said ..." (7:1–2a). The composition of the final form of Daniel 7–12 likewise, therefore, makes no claim on a sixth-century composition.

However, we cannot use these textual facts to escape an exegetical problem that has plagued the study of the book of Daniel for many years. Though the prophecies have a third person frame, they are delivered by Daniel in the first person and therefore make an implicit claim to originate in the sixth century. The prophecies themselves, in other words, require a sixth-century setting, and here is the problem.

The issue concerns the fact that the first six chapters, while presenting themselves as historical narrative, are surrounded by issues of historical accuracy, while the second six chapters, which are prophecy, are uncannily accurate and precise through the second century B.C., at least up to a definite point. To many, these facts appear to result from a second-century date of composition, where some of the historical persons and events of the Babylonian and Persian periods are a bit murky, while the more recent events of the Greek period are well known and clear. In other words, chapters that present the events of the third and second centuries B.C. as prophecy appear to have been written after the fact, and we can recognize the attempts at real prophecy by their failure to predict accurately (see the extended discussion in connection with the prophecy of ch. 11).

The conundrum is that faithful interpreters find themselves on two sides of the debate. On the one hand, there are those who believe it is necessary to stick to a sixth-century composition. Others feel that the text drives them to a second-century date, and if they believe that the Bible is the Word of God, they must then struggle with the theological issue of a book that, at least on the surface, attempts to deceive its audience into thinking it is prophesying future events when in reality it is casting the past into a future tense.

One attempt to get around this conundrum is to point to the well-established use of pseudonymity in the ancient Near East.³ Indeed, such pseudonymity was well practiced and often involved no attempt at deception. The original audience knew what the author was doing.⁴ However, I would argue that this approach fails when applied to the book of Daniel. The only way that Daniel's intention as demonstrated in the text can be achieved is by duping the audience. In other words, in prophecy given after the fact (vaticinium ex eventu) the idea was to convince the audience that the prophet was a true prophet to whom God had revealed the future. After showing that by predicting events that had already passed, then there was an attempt at a real prophecy. This is more than a literary device, and one must question whether such a textual strategy would find a place in God's Word.

This should not, however, obscure the extent of the difficulties of promoting a sixth-century date. The historical problems in the first part are real, and the solutions to some we can only speculate about (see commentary). Moreover, there are problems that need to be addressed at the end of chapter 11, when the prophecy appears to fail. We will provide another explanation than a late date at that point in the commentary, but we will not glibly push the problem under the rug.

These are difficult issues that will divide faithful interpreters for years. We must resist the temptation to turn this issue into a simple litmus test. Some argue that anyone who holds to a sixth-century date is a hopeless "fundie" who refuses to look at the evidence. Others will brand those who opt for a second-century date as "liberals" or "compromisers." I know that there will be reviewers of my work and approach who will view me as softminded or softhearted on this issue, but I argue that it is an unhelpful simplification to categorize on the basis of someone's conclusions on this matter. At the very least, we need to look at the motives and arguments behind the conclusions as well as at the treatment of the text in the light of the commentator's conclusions on the date of the book.

In view of the evidence and in spite of the difficulties, I interpret the book from the conclusion that the prophecies come from the sixth century B.C. I find the problems amenable to hypothetical solutions and the theological issues of a late date difficult to surmount. However, two brilliantly insightful commentators on the book would strongly disagree with me. J. Goldingay interprets the book as finally redacted in the second century B.C. (for a description of this century, see the commentary on Daniel 11), but at the same time he is motivated by a strong desire to follow the teaching of the text. He also clearly believes in the supernatural universe presented by the Bible and does not doubt that God can speak about the future. Furthermore, as we look below the surface of Sibley Towner's excellent contribution on Daniel,⁵ we note that he understands the book to be divine self-revelation, even though he categorically denies the possibility of the type of prophecy we find in the latter part of the book. To simply rule out these two theologically astute interpreters on the basis of their late date of the book would be a tragedy.⁶

In short, while the present commentary still finds a sixth-century date defensible, it refuses to discount all those who interpret from a second-century date. We agree with J. Baldwin, also an eminent interpreter of the book of Daniel,⁷ who in one of her last publications before her death stated: "The fact that the standpoint of the writer (sixth or second century B.C.) cannot be ascertained for certain does not greatly affect the interpretation."

Bridging Contexts

THE ISSUES SURROUNDING the relevance and application of the Old Testament to our lives and society at the turn of the third millennium A.D. is complex and debated. How does a text that was originally addressed to an audience in the sixth century B.C. retain its significance? Many Christians have difficulty relating to the Old Testament because of its distance from our lives. I would describe the book of Daniel's distance from us in three areas:

(1) Chronological. The book of Daniel was written over two and a half millennia ago. Times change. I recently watched a television show about America in the 1950s and was struck by how different life was in my youth than it is now, and there we are only speaking about forty years.

- (2) Cultural. Daniel was addressed to Israelites living in Babylonian exile. The world of Daniel was an ancient Near Eastern world. Our Western culture is completely different, and even current Middle Eastern cultures bear only the slightest resemblance to the world in which Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar lived.
- (3) Redemptive-historical. Perhaps here is where Daniel and the whole Old Testament are strange to Christians. In a word, Daniel lived in the world before the coming of Christ. We live looking back on his earthly ministry, death, and resurrection. Christians find the New Testament more immediately applicable for obvious reasons.

That there is continuity between the New Testament and the Old Testament is obvious to anyone who reads the Bible. The New Testament is saturated with Old Testament references. It builds on the foundation of the Old, and there are a number of passages that strongly assert its continuing validity. Perhaps most notable is Jesus' affirmation of the Law and Prophets (a first-century A.D. way of referring to what we know as the Old Testament):

Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them. I tell you the truth, until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished. Anyone who breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven, but whoever practices and teaches these commands will be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I tell you that unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. 5:17–20)

Jesus then goes on to talk about some specific ethical issues from the Old Testament, and the amazing thing is that, while he affirms the Old Testament teaching on murder, adultery, divorce, and so forth, he subtly transforms that teaching to something more internal and demanding. Adultery is not just sleeping with a woman; it is lusting after her. Murder is not just physically killing another person; it is anger toward another. Some would argue that Jesus draws a distinction not with the Old Testament teaching, but with human tradition that had grown up around the law, but I don't think a careful reading of the Sermon on the Mount in the light of the Old Testament can sustain that analysis. As we read the New Testament, there is neither strict continuity (as theonomists would insist) nor discontinuity (as some dispensationalists would have it), but rather both continuity and discontinuity between the Old and New Testaments.

Sorting out continuity and discontinuity cannot be reduced to a formula or simple principle. We have to ask questions about the transformation of culture and the movement of redemptive history. We will sort these issues out as we deal with specific passages in Daniel.¹⁰ However, here we may introduce a couple of major issues that will affect our approach throughout.

Christ, the Center of Biblical Revelation

THE BIBLE IS a book about God. It is God's self-revelation, and as we have seen, the book of Daniel masterfully demonstrates God's sovereignty over his people's past, present, and future. God's sovereignty infuses his people with confidence and hope in the midst of a difficult world. When Daniel's original audience read the book, they were given a new vista on their situation and their God.

Christians need to read the Old Testament from the perspective of the original audience, to be sure. But it would be a mistake to stop there. After all, we have received further revelation, and this further revelation casts its illuminating light back on the Old Testament. Saint Augustine captured what I mean with his well-known and catchy phrase: "The New Testament is in the Old concealed, and the Old Testament is in the New revealed."

The point is that continuing revelation has not imparted new meaning to the Old Testament but has illuminated the richer meaning of many texts that were not clear to the Old Testament people of God. Though debated, I believe this is what 1 Peter 1:10–12 indicates:

Concerning this salvation, the prophets, who spoke of the grace that was to come to you, searched intently and with the greatest care, trying to find out the time and circumstances to which the Spirit of Christ in them was pointing when he predicted the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow. It was revealed to them that they were not serving themselves but you, when they spoke of the things that have now been told you by those who have preached the gospel to you by the Holy Spirit sent from heaven. Even angels long to look into these things.

Perhaps most illustrative of the point I am making are two comments made by Jesus after his resurrection. His disciples were in a quandary about the events surrounding his death. They did not understand what was happening. How could their leader, in whom they had invested such hopes, end his life in such an ignominious way? Jesus chides two different groups of his followers in two different, but similar passages:

He said to them, "How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" And beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself. (Luke 24:25–27)

He said to them, "This is what I told you while I was still with you: Everything must be fulfilled that is written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms."

Then he opened their minds so they could understand the Scriptures. (Luke 24:44–45)

Most Christians would affirm that a handful of passages in the Old Testament predict Christ's coming in a spectacular way. If asked, they would point to the promise of the virgin birth in Isaiah 7, a reference to the "Anointed One" or Messiah in Psalm 2, and a few other passages. If we looked closely at these passages, we would see that they too have an Old Testament setting and are not messianic in a narrow sense. However, the point I want to emphasize is that Jesus' words invite a much broader understanding of how the Old Testament anticipates his coming. In Luke 24 Jesus speaks in global terms ("Moses and all the Prophets," "all the Scriptures," "the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms"). As we read the Old Testament, we can read it with the expectation that we will encounter Christ there."

This principle can be and often is abused. It is wrong to take a short passage of Scripture out of context and twist it until some vague connection with Christ is seen. It is dangerous to read the Old Testament in the light of the New before first reading the Old Testament in its original context. But it is equally incorrect for a Christian to neglect to read the Old in the fuller light of the New Testament. After all, the Bible, while composed of many different writings from many different time periods, is ultimately one organic revelation, whose author is God himself. We would naturally expect that later revelation will more fully disclose the truths of earlier Scripture. We will operate with this principle in the commentary that follows. Of course, the reader will have to judge whether we have persuasively shown how Christ is anticipated in a particular passage or whether we have fallen into the trap of pressing the case too strongly.

"Go Thou and Do Likewise": Do We Follow the Example of Daniel?

As WE STUDY the book of Daniel, we expect to hear God's story. The book is filled with human characters and actions, but God is the subtle background character. We have also just argued that the Old Testament, including Daniel, is not just a theocentric book, but also a Christocentric book. Christ is anticipated in the Old Testament and proclaimed in the New. By emphasizing what might be called the theological message of the book, we avoid a common fallacy—a purely moralistic approach to the Old Testament. Most sermons and teaching on the book err by falling into the trap of simply turning Old Testament characters into heroes and villains: "Be like Daniel!" or "Don't be like Belshazzar!" Such teaching removes the focus of the biblical book from the intended main point, God, and thus misses the power of the passage.¹²

There is a further pitfall for which we need to account. Daniel 1–6 is historical narrative; it tells us what happened to Daniel and his three friends in the Babylonian and Persian courts. Is it legitimate to assume that just because Daniel is a hero of the faith that his actions are presented as normative for all time? When the question is presented baldly in this manner, the answer is certainly no. Just because Daniel acted in a certain way does not mean that his actions are instructions to how we should behave today. Daniel's vegetarian diet in the first chapter certainly should not have us pushing meat away from our tables. We don't have to pray in an upstairs room or in a room with windows (6:10) to pray sincerely. We must be very careful not to fall into the trap of saying that Daniel's actions are necessarily normative for our actions.

However, neither are they totally irrelevant. The Bible is not only a theological book; it is also an ethical book. The Old Testament historical books are not just there to teach us what happened in the past or about the nature of God in the abstract, but also intend to shape our emotions and our actions. God could have given us a philosophical or theological treatise if his goal was to simply inform us about his nature, but instead he gave us his Word in the form of stories and poems that evoke the whole person—will and emotions as well as intellect. That the Old Testament narratives have a didactic intention suggested by the preface to Psalm 78:

O my people, hear my teaching;
listen to the words of my mouth.

I will open my mouth in parables,
I will utter hidden things, things from of old—what we have heard and known, what our fathers have told us.

We will not hide them from their children;
we will tell the next generation
the praiseworthy deeds of the LORD, his power, and the wonders he has done.
He decreed statutes for Jacob and established the law in Israel, which he commanded our forefathers to teach their children, so the next generation would know them, even the children yet to be born, and they in turn would tell their children.

Then they would put their trust in God and would not forget his deeds but would keep his commands.

They would not be like their forefathers— a stubborn and rebellious generation, whose hearts were not loyal to God, whose spirits were not faithful to him. (Ps. 78:1–8)

The "parables" that follow in Psalm 78, which have as their intention obedience, are stories from Israel's past, mostly behavior to avoid. History can have a didactic function, and Old Testament history's lessons continue in an important sense in the New Testament period as well. After reminding his readers of the crossing of the Red Sea and the desert wandering, Paul asserts: "Now these things occurred as examples to keep us from setting our hearts on evil things as they did" (1 Cor. 10:6). Throughout the New Testament, different historical episodes of the Old Testament are recited to serve as paradigms of behavior in the post-Christ period (e.g., Heb. 11:4–40; James 5:10–11, 16–18).

However, warnings about simple appropriation of the Old Testament are crucial. The chronological, cultural, and redemptive-historical distance must be taken into account as we adjudicate the application of an ancient text to a modern situation. Readers of this commentary will have to judge for themselves whether I have persuasively charted the course through the potential pitfalls, but, as discussions in the specific chapters will underline, they can be sure that I am aware of the dangers both of neglecting this important aspect of the biblical text as well as blindly assuming that the ancient text provides normative role models and principles of living for us today.

Outline of Daniel

I. Daniel and the Three Friends in Nebuchadnezzar's Court (1:1-21)

- A. Jehoiakim Delivered Into Nebuchadnezzar's Hand (1:1–2)
- B. Training for Service (1:3–7)
- C. Avoiding Defilement (1:8–16)
- D. Success Given to Daniel and His Friends (1:17–20)
- E. The Extent of Daniel's Ministry (1:21)

II. The God of Wisdom Reveals Nebuchadnezzar's Dream to Daniel (2:1–49)

- A. The King and His Advisors (2:1–13)
- B. God's Revealing of the Mystery to Daniel (2:14–23)
- C. The Dream and Its Interpretation (2:24–45)
- D. The King's Response (2:46–49)

III. God Saves the Three Friends from the Fiery Furnace (3:1-30)

- A. Nebuchadnezzar's Image of Gold (3:1–7)
- B. The Accusation Against the Three Friends (3:8–12)
- C. The Confrontation With Nebuchadnezzar (3:13–18)
- D. The Miraculous Deliverance (3:19–27)
- E. Nebuchadnezzar Worships God (3:28–30)

IV. Nebuchadnezzar's Pride Takes a Fall (4:1–37)

- A. Nebuchadnezzar's Decree to Praise the Lord (4:1–3)
- B. The Dream Report and the Search for an Interpreter (4:4–18)
- C. The Dream Interpretation (4:19–27)
- D. The Fulfillment of the Dream (4:28–33)
- E. Healing and Concluding Doxology (4:34–37)

V. The Writing on the Wall (5:1–31)

- A. The Profanation of the Holy Vessels (5:1–4)
- B. The Enigmatic Writing on the Wall (5:5–12)
- C. Daniel's Interpretation of the Inscription (5:13–28)
- D. Reward and Punishment (5:29–31)

VI. Daniel in the Lions' Den (6:1–28)

- A. The Plot Against Daniel (6:1–9)
- B. The Trap and Reluctant Punishment (6:10–18)
- C. Daniel's Rescue and the Accusers' Demise (6:19–24)
- D. Darius's Decree (6:25–28)

VII. The Vision of the Four Beasts (7:1–28)

- A. Horror by the Sea (7:1-8)
- B. Heavenly Power (7:9–14)
- C. Divine Victory (7:15–28)

VIII. The Ram and the Goat (8:1–27)

- A. The Vision of a Ram and a Goat (8:1–14)
- B. The Interpretation of the Vision (8:15–27)

IX. Daniel's Prayer of Repentance (9:1–27)

- A. Preparation for Prayer (9:1–4a)
- B. Invocation and Confession (9:4b–10)
- C. God's Punishment (9:11–14)
- D. Appeal for Mercy (9:15–19)
- E. The Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks (9:20–27)

X. The Vision of a Heavenly Messenger (10:1–11:1)

- A. A Heavenly Vision (10:1–9)
- B. A Conversation With a Supernatural Being (10:10–11:1)

XI. The Scope and End of History (11:2-12:13)

- A. Persia and Greece (11:2–4)
- B. Struggles Between the Kings of the North and the Kings of the South (11:5–20)
- C. The Climactic King of the North (11:21–35)

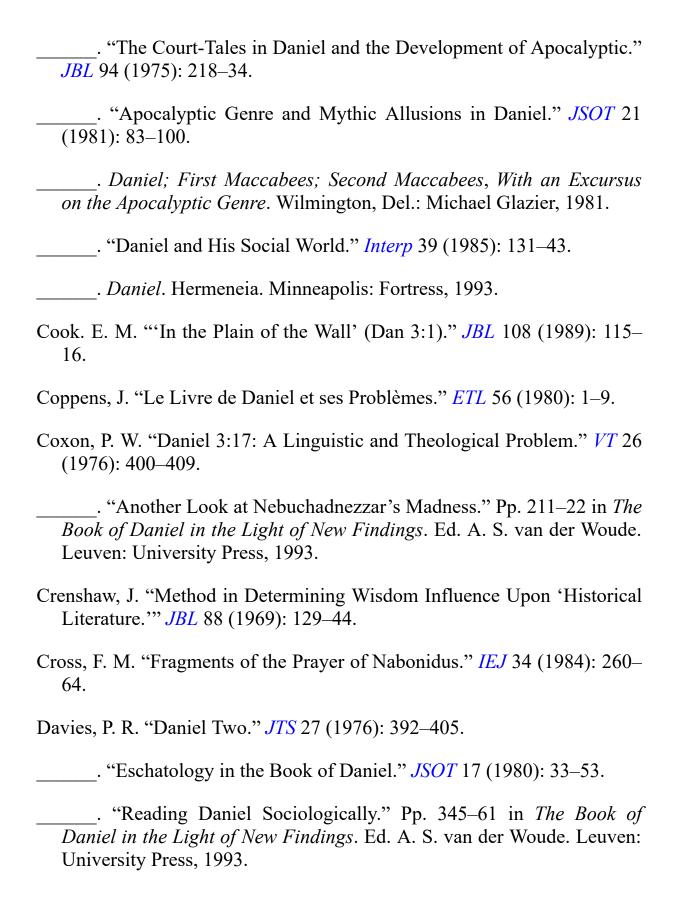

- D. The King Who Will Do As He Pleases (11:36–45)
- E. The Salvation of God's People (12:1-4)
- F. Final Words (12:5–13)

Bibliography

- Ackroyd, P. R. "The Temple Vessels—A Continuity Theme." Pp. 166–81 in Studies in the Religion of Ancient Israel. Leiden: Brill, 1972.
- Adler, W. "The Apocalyptic Survey of History Adapted by Christians: Daniel's Prophecy of 70 Weeks." Pp. 201–38 in The Jewish Apocalyptic Heritage in Early Christianity. Ed. J. C. VanderKam and W. Adler. Assen/Minneapolis: Van Gorcum/Fortress, 1996.
- Allender, D., and T. Longman III. Bold Love. Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1991.
- _____. Cry of the Soul. Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1993.
- Amerding, C. "Russia and the King of the North." BSac 120 (1963): 50–55.
- _____. "Asleep in the Dust." BSac 121 (1964): 153–58.
- Arnold, B. T. "Wordplay and Narrative Techniques in Daniel 5 and 6." JBL 112 (1993): 479–85.
- Arnold, C. E. Three Crucial Questions About Spiritual Warfare. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1997.
- Avalos, H. I. "The Comedic Function of the Enumerations of Officials and Instruments in Daniel 3." CBQ 53 (1991): 580–88.
- Bampfylde, G. "The Prince of the Host in the Book of Daniel and the Dead Sea Scrolls." JSJ 14 (1983): 129–34.
- Beale, G. K. "The Influence of Daniel Upon the Structure and Theology of John's Apocalypse." JETS 27 (1984): 413–23.
- _____. "The Origin of the Title 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords' in Revelation 17.14." NTS 31 (1985): 618–20.

- _____. "A Reconsideration of the Text of Daniel in the Apocalypse." Biblica 67 (1986): 539–43.
- Becking, B. "A Divine Spirit Is in You': Notes on the Translation of the Phrase ruah lahin* in Daniel 5,14 and Related Texts." Pp. 515–19 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993.
- Bergman, B. Z. "Han'el in Daniel 2:25 and 6:19." JNES 27 (1968): 69–70.
- Berquist, J. Judaism in Persia's Shadow. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995.
- Birkeland, H. "The Belief in the Resurrection of the Dead in the Old Testament." ST 3 (1950–51): 60–78.
- Black, M. "The Throne-Theophany Prophetic Commission and the 'Son of Man': A Study in Tradition History." Pp. 46–75 in Jews, Greeks and Christians: Religious Cultures in Late Antiquity. Ed. R. Hamerton-Kelly and R. Scroggs. Leiden: Brill, 1976.
- Bloch, A. A. "Questioning God's Omnipotence in the Bible: A Linguistic Case Study." Pp. 174–88 in Semitic Studies in Honor of Wolf Leslau, vol. 1. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1991.
- Boccaccini, G. "Daniel and the Dream Visions: The Genre of Apocalyptic and the Apocalyptic Tradition." Pp. 126–60 in Middle Judaism: Jewish Thought, 300 B.C.E. to 200 B.C.E. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991.
- Boogaart, T. A. "Daniel 6: A Tale of Two Empires." The Reformed Review 39–40 (1985–1987): 106–12.
- Bork, R. H. Slouching Towards Gomorrah. New York: HarperCollins, 1996.
- Brewer, D. I. "Mene Mene Teqel Uparsin: Daniel 5:25 in Cuneiform." TynBul 42 (1991): 311–16.

- Brichto, H. D. The Names of God: Poetic Readings in Biblical Beginnings. Oxford: University Press, 1998.
- Brueggemann, W. "At the Mercy of Babylon: A Subversive Rereading of the Empire." JBL 110 (1991): 3–22.
- Callega, J. "The Use of Daniel 3 in the Eclogae Propheticae (chs. 1–9) of Clement of Alexandria." Augustinianum 26 (1986): 401–11.
- Caragounis, C. C. "History and Supra-History: Daniel and the Four Empires." Pp. 387–97 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993.
- Carroll, R. P. "Prophecy and Dissonance: A Theoretical Approach to the Prophetic Tradition." ZAW 92 (1980): 108–19.
- Carson, D. A., and J. D. Woodbridge. God and Culture: Essays in Honor of Carl F. H. Henry. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993.
- Casey, M. Son of Man: The Interpretation and Influence of Daniel 7. London: SPCK, 1979.
- Chave, P. "But if not ..." ExpTim 97 (1986): 369–70.
- Clifford, R. J. "History and Myth in Daniel 10–12." BASOR 220 (1975): 23–26.
- Clowney, E. P. Preaching and Biblical Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961.
- Cohn, N. Cosmos, Chaos and the World to Come: The Ancient Roots of Apocalyptic Faith. New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1993.
- Collins, J. J. "Apocalyptic Eschatology as the Transcendence of Death." CBQ 36 (1974): 21–43.
- _____. The Apocalyptic Vision of the Book of Daniel. Missoula, Mont.: Scholars, 1977.

- Derrett, J. D. M. "Daniel in Salvation History." Pp. 132–38 in Studies in the New Testament. Leiden: Brill, 1986.
- Dillard, R. B., and T. Longman III. An Introduction to the Old Testament. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994.
- DiLella, A. "The One in Human Likeness and the Holy Ones of the Most High in Daniel 7." CBQ 39 (1977): 1–19.
- Doukhan, J. B. Daniel: The Vision of the End. Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews Univ. Press, 1987.
- Fertch, A. J. "Daniel 7 and Ugarit: A Reconsideration." JBL 99 (1980): 75–86.
- Fewell, D. N. Circle of Sovereignty: A Story of Stories in Daniel 1–6. JSOTSUP 72. Sheffield: JSOT, 1988.
- Flusser, D. "The Four Empires in the Fourth Sibyl and in the Book of Daniel." IOS 2 (1972): 148–75.
- Foster, B. R. Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature. 2 vols. Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 1993.
- Freyne, S. "The Disciples in Mark and the Maskilim in Daniel: A Comparison." JSNT 16 (1982): 7–23.
- Frolich, I. "Time and Times and Half a Time": Historical Consciousness in the Jewish Literature of the Persian and Hellenistic Eras. JSPSS 19. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996.
- Gammie, J. G. "The Classification, Stages of Growth, and Changing Intentions in the Book of Daniel." JBL 95 (1976): 191–204.
- Glasson, T. F. "Visions of Thy Head' (Daniel 2:25): The Heart and the Head in Bible Psychology." ExpTim 81 (1970): 247–48.
- Goldingay, J. E. "The Book of Daniel: Three Issues." Themelios 3 (1977): 45–49.

- _____. Daniel. WBC. Waco, Tex.: Word, 1989.
- _____. "Story, Vision, Interpretation: Literary Approaches to Daniel." Pp. 295–313 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993.
- Gowan, D. E. "The Exile in Jewish Apocalyptic." Pp. 205–23 in Scripture in History and Theology: Essays in Honor of J. Coert Rylaarsdam. Ed. A. L. Merril and T. W. Overholt. Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1977.
- Grabbe, L. L. "The End of the Desolations of Jerusalem': From Jeremiah's 70 Years to Daniel's 70 Weeks of Years." Pp. 67–72 in Early Jewish and Christian Exegesis: Studies in Memory of William Hugh Brownlee. Ed. C. A. Evans and W. F. Stinespring. Atlanta: Scholars, 1987.
- _____. "The Belshazzar of Daniel and the Belshazzar of History." AUSS 26 (1988): 59–66.
- Greidanus, S. Sola Scriptura: Problems and Principles in Preaching Historical Texts. Kampen: J. H. Kok, 1970.
- Grelot, P. "L'Orchestre de Daniel III 5, 7, 10, 15." VT 29 (1979): 23–38.
- Gruenthaner, M. J. "The Last King of Babylon." CBQ 11 (1949): 406–27.
- Guglielmo, Antonine de. "Dan. 5:25—An Example of a Double Literal Sense." CBQ 11 (1949): 202–6.
- Guinness, O. The American Hour. New York: Macmillan, 1993.
- Gurney, R. J. M. "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel 2 and 7." Themelios 2 (1977): 39–45.
- _____. "The Seventy Weeks of Daniel 9:24–27." EvQ 53 (1981): 29–36.
- Hartman, L. F., and A. A. DiLella. The Book of Daniel. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978.

- Hasel, G. F. "The Book of Daniel: Evidences Relating to Persons and Chronology." AUSS 19 (1981): 37–49.
- . "The Four World Empires of Daniel 2 Against Its Near Eastern Environment." JSOT 12 (1979): 17–30.
- _____. "The First and Third Years of Belshazzar (Dan. 7:1; 8:1)." AUSS 15 (1976): 153ff.
- Hilton, M. "Babel Reversed—Daniel 5." JSOT 66 (1995): 99–112.
- Hoehner, H. W. "Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ." BSac 132 (1975): 47–65.
- Humphreys, W. Lee. "A Life-Style for Diaspora: A Study of the Tales of Esther and Daniel." JBL 92 (1973): 211–23.
- Hunter, J. D. Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America. New York: Basic Books, 1991.
- Husser, J.-M. "La fin et l'origine: Consequence inattendue de l'eschatologie in Dn 2." Pp. 243–64 in Le Dieu Qui Vient. Ed. Raymond Kuntzman. Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1995.
- Kalafian, M. The Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks of the Book of Daniel. Lanham, Md.: Univ. Press of America, 1991.
- Klein, J. "In God They Trust." The New Yorker (June 16, 1997), 40–48.
- Kline, M. G. "The Covenant of the Seventieth Week." Pp. 452–69 in The Law and the Prophets. Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1974.
- Knibb, M. A. "You Are Indeed Wiser Than Daniel': Reflections on the Character of the Book of Daniel." Pp. 399–411 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993.
- Kraeling, E. G. "The Handwriting on the Wall." JBL 63 (1944): 11–18.

Lacocque, A. "The Liturgical Prayer in Daniel 9." HUCA 47 (1976): 119– 42. . The Book of Daniel. Atlanta: John Knox, 1979. . Daniel in His Time. Columbia, S.C.: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1988. . "The Socio-Spiritual Formative Milieu of the Daniel Apocalypse." Pp. 315–41 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993. Lasch, C. The Revolt of the Elites and the Betrayal of Democracy. New York: Norton, 1995. Lash, N. The Beginning and the End of "Religion." Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1996. Lawson, J. "The God Who Reveals Secrets': The Mesopotamian Background to Daniel 2.47." JSOT 74 (1997): 61–76. Lindenberger, J. M. "Daniel 12:1–4." Interp 39 (1985): 181–86. Long, V. Philips. The Art of Biblical History. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994. Longman III, T. "Psalm 98: A Divine Warrior Victory Song," JETS (1984): 267–74. . Literary Approaches to Biblical Interpretation. Foundations in Contemporary Hermeneutics 3. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1987. . "God's Law and Mosaic Punishments Today." Pp. 41–58 in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique. Ed. W. S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990. . "What I Mean by Historical-Grammatical Exegesis—Why I Am Not a Literalist." GTJ 11 (1990): 41–58.

- ______. Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study. Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1991.

 ______. Reading the Bible with Heart and Mind. Colorado Springs:
 NavPress, 1997.

 _____. The Book of Ecclesiastes. NICOT. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998.
- _____, and D. Reid. God Is a Warrior. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995.
- Lucas, E. C. "The Origin of Daniel's Four Empires Scheme Re-Examined." TynBul 40 (1989): 185–202.
- Lust, J. "Daniel 7:13 and the Septuagint." ETL 54 (1978): 62–69.
- Mastin, B. A. "Daniel 2:46 and the Hellenistic World." ZAW 85 (1973): 80–93.
- _____. "The Reading of 1QDan^a at Daniel II 4." VT 38 (1988): 341–46.
- _____. "The Meaning of *h*¹*la* at Daniel iv 27." VT 42 (1992): 234–47.
- _____. "Wisdom and Daniel." Pp. 161–69 in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essay in Honour of J. A. Emerton. Ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon, and H. G. M. Williamson. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1995.
- McComiskey, T. E. "The Seventy 'Weeks' of Daniel Against the Background of Ancient Near Eastern Literature." WTJ 47 (1985): 18–45.
- Meadowcroft, T. J. Aramaic Daniel and Greek Daniel. JSOTSup 198. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995.
- Mercer, M. E. "Daniel 1:1 and Jehoiakim's Three Years of Servitude." AUSS 27 (1989): 179–92.
- Millard, A. "Daniel and Belshazzar in History." BAR 11 (1985): 73-78.

- Miller, C. J. Repentance and Twentieth Century Man. Fort Washington, Pa.: Christian Literature Crusade, 1975.
- _____, and Barbara M. Juliani. Come Back, Barbara. 2d ed. Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1997.
- Miller, S. R. Daniel. NAC. Nashville: Broadman, 1994.
- Montgomery, J. S. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1927, 1950.
- Moore, M. S. "Resurrection and Immorality: Two Motifs Navigating Confluent Theological Streams in the Old Testament (Dan 12, 1–4)." TZ 39 (1983): 17–34.
- Mouw, R. J. Politics and the Biblical Drama. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976.
- _____. Uncommon Decency: Christian Civility in an Uncivil World. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1992.
- Neibuhr, H. R. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper and Row, 1951.
- Newman, R. C. "Daniel's Seventy Weeks and the Old Testament Sabbath-Year Cycle." JETS 16 (1973): 229–34.
- Nicol, G. G. "Isaiah's Vision and the Visions of Daniel." VT 29 (1979): 501–5.
- Niditch, S. "The Visionary." Pp. 153–79 in Ideal Figures in Ancient Judaism. Ed. J. J. Collins and G. W. Nickelsburg. Chicago: Scholars, 1980.
- Niditch, S., and R. Doran. "The Success Story of the Wise Courtier: A Formal Approach." JBL 96 (1977): 179–93.
- Nunez, S. The Vision of Daniel 8: Interpretations from 1700 to 1800. Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews Univ. Press, 1987.

- Parker, P. "The Meaning of 'Son of Man." JBL 60 (1941): 151–57.
- Patterson, R. D. "The Key Role of Daniel 7." GTJ 12 (1991): 245–61.
- Paul, S. M. "Daniel 3:29—A Case Study of 'Neglected' Blasphemy." JNES 42 (1983): 291–94.
- _____. "Decoding a 'Joint' Expression in Daniel 5:6, 16." JANES 22 (1993): 121–27.
- Pierce, R. W. "Spiritual Failure, Postponement, and Daniel 9." TrinJ 10 (1989): 211–22.
- Plantinga, Jr., C. Not the Way It's Supposed to Be: A Breviary of Sin. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995.
- Polak, F. "The Daniel Tales in Their Aramaic Literary Milieu." Pp. 249–65 in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings. Ed. A. S. van der Woude. Leuven: University Press, 1993.
- Porteous, N. W. Daniel: A Commentary. OTL. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965.
- Poythress, V. S. "The Holy Ones of the Most High and Daniel vii." VT 26 (1976): 208–13.
- Prinsloo, G. T. M. "Two Poems in a Sea of Prose: The Content and Context of Daniel 2:20–23 and 6:27–28." JSOT 59 (1993): 93–108.
- Quaegebeur, J. "On the Egyptian Equivalent of Biblical hartummim." Pp. 162–72 in Pharaonic Egypt: The Bible and Christianity. Ed. S. Israelit-Groll. Jerusalem: Magnes, 1985.
- Rad, G. von. Wisdom in Israel. London: SCM, 1970.
- Reeves, E. "Daniel 5 and the Assayer: Galileo Reads the Handwriting on the Wall." JMRS 21 (1991): 1–27.

- Reid, S. B. Enoch and Daniel: A Form Critical and Sociological Study of Historical Apocalypses. Berkeley, Calif.: Bibal, 1989.
- Reston Jr., J. The Last Apocalypse: Europe at the Year 1000. New York: Doubleday, 1998.
- Rosenberg, R. A. "The Slain Messiah in the Old Testament." ZAW 99 (1987): 259–61.
- Rowland, C. "A Man Clothed in Linen: Daniel 10:6ff and Jewish Angelology." JSNT 24 (1985): 99–110.
- Ryken, L., and T. Longman III. A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995.
- Sawyer, J. F. A. "'My Secret Is with Me' (Isaiah 24.16): Some Semantic Links Between Isaiah 24–27 and Daniel." Pp. 307–17 in Understanding Poets and Prophets. Ed. A. G. Auld. Sheffield: JSOT, 1993.
- Schaeffer, F. A. A Christian Manifesto. Westchester, Ill.: Crossway, 1981.
- Shea, W. H. "Daniel 3: Extra-Biblical Texts and the Convocation on the Plain of Dura." AUSS 20 (1982): 29–52.
- _____. "A Further Note on Daniel 6: Daniel As 'Governor." AUSS 21 (1983): 169–71.
- _____. "Wrestling with the Prince of Persia: A Study on Daniel 10." AUSS 21 (1983): 225–50.
- _____. "Further Literary Structures in Daniel 2–7: An Analysis of Daniel 4." AUSS 23 (1985): 193–202.
- _____. "Bel(te)shazzar Meets Belshazzar." AUSS 26 (1988): 67–88.
- Smedes, L. B. Shame and Grace: Healing the Shame We Don't Deserve. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1993.

- Soesilo, D. "Why Did Daniel Reject the King's Delicacies? (Daniel 1:8)" BT 45 (1994): 441–44.
- Steiner, G. No Passion Spent. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1996.
- Steussy, M. J. Gardens in Babylon: Narrative and Faith in the Greek Legends of Daniel. SBLDS 141. Atlanta: Scholars, 1993.
- Stone, M. "A Note on Daniel i.3." AusBR 7 (1959): 69-71.
- Thiering, B. E. "The Three and a Half Years of Elijah." NovT 23 (1981): 41–55.
- Towner, W. S. "The Poetic Passages of Daniel 1–6." CBQ 31 (1969): 317–26.
- _____. Daniel. Interpretation. Atlanta: John Knox, 1984.
- _____. "Daniel 1 in the Context of the Canon." Pp. 285–98 in Canon, Theology, and Old Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Brevard S. Childs. Ed. G. M. Tucker, D. L. Petersen, and R. R. Wilson. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988.
- Trever, J. "The Book of Daniel and the Origin of the Qumran Community." BA 48 (1985): 89–103.
- Volf, M. Exclusion and Embrace: A Theological Exploration of Identity, Otherness, and Reconciliation. Nashville: Abingdon, 1996.
- Wagner, P. Breaking Strongholds in Your City: How to Use Spiritual Mapping to Make Your Prayers More Strategic, Effective and Targeted. Ventura, Calif.: Regal Books, 1993.
- Walton, J. H. "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel." JETS 29 (1986): 25–36.
- _____. "The Decree of Darius the Mede in Daniel 6." JETS 31 (1988): 279–86.

- Walton, J. H., L. D. Bailey, and C. Williford. "Bible-Based Curricula and the Crisis of Scriptural Authority." Christian Education Journal 13 (1993): 83–94.
- Walvoord, J. F. "Is the Seventieth Week of Daniel Future?" BSac 101 (1944): 30–49.
- Watts, J. W. "Babylonian Idolatry in the Prophets as a False Socio-Economic System." Pp. 115–22 in Israel's Apostasy and Restoration. Ed. A. Gileadi. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1988.
- _____. "Daniel's Praise (Daniel 2.20–23)." Pp. 145–54 in Psalm and Story: Inset Hymns in Hebrew Narrative. Sheffield: JSOT, 1992.
- Wenham, D. "The Kingdom of God and Daniel." ExpTim 98 (1987): 132–34.
- Wenham, G. J. "Daniel: The Basic Issues." Themelios 3 (1977): 49–51.
- Wesselius, J. W. "Language and Style in Biblical Aramaic: Observations on the Unity of Daniel II–VI." VT 38 (1988): 194–209.
- Wharton, J. A. "Daniel 3:16–18." Interp 39 (1985): 170–76.
- Willi-Plein, I. "Ursprung und Motivation der Apokalyptik im Danielbuch." TZ 35 (1979): 265–74.
- Wills, L. M. The Jew in the Court of the Foreign King. HDR 26. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990.
- Wilson, G. "The Prayer of Daniel 9: Reflection on Jeremiah 29." JSOT 48 (1990): 91–99.
- Wink, W. Naming the Powers: The Language of Power in the New Testament. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.
- _____. Unmasking the Powers: The Invisible Forces That Determine Human Existence. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986.

- _____. Engaging the Powers: Discernment and Resistance in a World of Domination. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1992.
- _____. When the Powers Fall: Reconciliation in the Healing of Nations. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1998.
- Witstruck, T. "The Influence of Treaty Curse Imagery on the Beast Imagery of Daniel." JBL 97 (1978): 100–102.
- Wolters, A. "The Riddle of the Scales in Daniel 5." HUCA 62 (1991): 155–77.
- . "Untying the King's Knots: Physiology and Wordplay in Daniel 5." JBL 110 (1991): 117–22.
- Wood, L. J. A Commentary on Daniel. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1973.
- Yamauchi, E. M. "Hermeneutical Issues in the Book of Daniel." JETS 23 (1980): 14–22.
- _____. "Daniel and Contacts Between the Aegean and the Near East Before Alexander." EvQ 53 (1981): 37–47.
- Yancey, P. "A State of Ungrace." CT 41 (February 3, 1997): 30–37.
- _____. What's So Amazing About Grace? Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1997.
- Young, E. J. The Prophecy of Daniel: A Commentary. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949.
- _____. The Messianic Prophecies of Daniel. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1954.
- Zadok, R. "The Origin of the Name Shinar." ZAW 74 (1984): 240–44.
- Zevit, Z. "The Exegetical Implications of Daniel viii 1, ix 21." VT 28 (1978): 488–92.

Zimmermann, F. "The Writing on the Wall: Daniel 5:25f." JQR 55 (1964–65): 201–7.

Text and Commentary on Daniel

Daniel 1:1-21

¹In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came to Jerusalem and besieged it. ²And the Lord delivered Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, along with some of the articles from the temple of God. These he carried off to the temple of his god in Babylonia and put in the treasure house of his god.

³Then the king ordered Ashpenaz, chief of his court officials, to bring in some of the Israelites from the royal family and the nobility—⁴young men without any physical defect, handsome, showing aptitude for every kind of learning, well informed, quick to understand, and qualified to serve in the king's palace. He was to teach them the language and literature of the Babylonians. ⁵The king assigned them a daily amount of food and wine from the king's table. They were to be trained for three years, and after that they were to enter the king's service.

⁶Among these were some from Judah: Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. ⁷The chief official gave them new names: to Daniel, the name Belteshazzar; to Hananiah, Shadrach; to Mishael, Meshach; and to Azariah, Abednego.

⁸But Daniel resolved not to defile himself with the royal food and wine, and he asked the chief official for permission not to defile himself this way. ⁹Now God had caused the official to show favor and sympathy to Daniel, ¹⁰but the official told Daniel, "I am afraid of my lord the king, who has assigned your food and drink. Why should he see you looking worse than the other young men your age? The king would then have my head because of you."

¹¹Daniel then said to the guard whom the chief official had appointed over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah, ¹²"Please test your servants for ten days: Give us nothing but vegetables to eat and water to drink. ¹³Then compare our appearance with that of the young men who eat the royal food, and treat your servants in accordance with what you see." ¹⁴So he agreed to this and tested them for ten days.

¹⁵At the end of the ten days they looked healthier and better nourished than any of the young men who ate the royal food. ¹⁶So the guard took away their choice food and the wine they were to drink and gave them vegetables instead.

¹⁷To these four young men God gave knowledge and understanding of all kinds of literature and learning. And Daniel could understand visions and dreams of all kinds.

¹⁸At the end of the time set by the king to bring them in, the chief official presented them to Nebuchadnezzar. ¹⁹The king talked with them, and he found none equal to Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah; so they entered the king's service. ²⁰In every matter of wisdom and understanding about which the king questioned them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and enchanters in his whole kingdom.

²¹And Daniel remained there until the first year of King Cyrus.

Original Meaning

THE FIRST CHAPTER of the book of Daniel is a distinct unit. It begins and ends with a chronological marker that identifies the beginning and end of Daniel's career ("the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim" [v. 1] and "the first year of King Cyrus" [v. 21]). In terms of our dating system, this places Daniel's career from 605 to 539 B.C.¹

Daniel 1 provides an introduction for the whole book, plunging us quickly into the action and introducing the main characters of the book. It also illustrates the overarching theme of the book: In spite of present appearances, God is in control. In keeping with the court narratives in chapters 1–6, the first chapter narrates an episode from the experience of Daniel and his three friends that models another important lesson: Though in exile, God gives his people the ability to prosper as well as to be faithful. This chapter, and the book as a whole, must have served as a tremendous encouragement to the faith of those devout exiles who felt as if their whole world had come crashing down on their heads.

This first chapter has the following outline: (1) Jehoiakim delivered into Nebuchadnezzar's hand (1:1–2); (2) training for service (1:3–7); (3) avoiding defilement (1:8–16); (4) success given to Daniel and his friends (1:17–20); and (5) the extent of Daniel's ministry (1:21).

Jehoiakim Delivered into Nebuchadnezzar's Hand (1:1-2)

THE NARRATOR IMMERSES us immediately into the action. Nebuchadnezzar² has moved against Jerusalem. As Fewell has pointed out, our story begins at the end of another story.³ The forces that brought Nebuchadnezzar (or at least his army) to Jerusalem during the reign of Jehoiakim are hinted at elsewhere (cf. 2 Chron. 36:5–7⁴); here we are simply informed that he moved against Jerusalem, resulting in the deportation of the heroes of our book.

Before recounting the events that led up to Daniel 1:1, we must acknowledge the fact that many scholars (those who argue that Daniel 1 is written much later than the sixth century B.C.) believe that Daniel 1:1–2 is a confused historical memory,⁵ based on the author's misreading of 2 Chronicles 36:6–7 in connection with 2 Kings 24:1. On this basis, Hartman and DiLella deny that Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem in 605 B.C., the date implied by our text. In addition, they argue that Nebuchadnezzar did not even become king of Babylon until the next year.⁶ A surface reading of Jeremiah 25:1 ("the word came to Jeremiah concerning all the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, which was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon") seems to imply that Nebuchadnezzar did not even become king until Jehoiakim's fourth year. These scholars also point out that the Babylonian Chronicle, our main native source of information for this time period, does not mention Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem.

There are at least two possible harmonizations that permit us to accept Daniel 1:1–2 as an accurate historical memory. First, Daniel 1:1 may well refer to Nebuchadnezzar as king in an anticipatory sense. After all, it is soon after Daniel's report of a siege of Jerusalem that Nabopolassar's death would bring Nebuchadnezzar to the throne. No one doubts, based on Babylonian records themselves, Nebuchadnezzar's presence as crown prince and field commander of the Babylonian army in their wars against Egypt in the area of Syria-Palestine in the years before 605 B.C.

We can also harmonize the data by reminding ourselves, at the instigation of the well-known Assyriologist D. J. Wiseman, that there were two systems of dating current in the ancient Near Eastern world, both of which can be found in the Old Testament.⁷ The above passages may be harmonized by assuming that Jeremiah utilized the Judaean method of chronological reckoning, which counts the first year of a king's reign as the first year, and that Daniel used the Babylonian system, which counts the first year as an "accession year." Hasel helpfully diagrammed the results:⁸

Chronology of Kings in Jeremiah and Daniel

Accession-year method	Accession year	2 nd year	Daniel 1:1
Non-accession-year method	1st year	3 rd year	Jeremiah 25:1, 9; 46:2

It is true that the Babylonian Chronicle provides ambiguous evidence in the argument for and against a Babylonian assault against Jerusalem in the period 605/604 B.C. Wiseman in 1965 argued that the Babylonian Chronicle fails to mention the siege of Jerusalem because it is preoccupied with "the major defeat of the Egyptians," but he goes on to say that "a successful incursion into Judah by the Babylonian army group which returned from the Egyptian border could be included in the claim that at that time Nebuchadnezzar conquered 'all Hatti.'"

However, in 1985¹⁰ he agreed with Grayson¹¹ that the relevant line of the Chronicles (BM 21946, 8) should be read as referring to Hamath and not Hatti. J. J. Collins, then, took this as decisive evidence that the Daniel account is not accurate; there was no deportation of any size this early.¹² However, he fails to report, as Wiseman goes on to say, that the next section of the Chronicle does report activity in the area of Hatti. Wiseman further reminds us that the phrase used in Daniel 1:1 does not necessarily mean that a formal military siege was laid against Jerusalem; it could mean no more, he says, than to "show hostility." Thus, Wiseman demonstrates how the biblical reference to the third year of Jehoiakim "could be a justifiable dating if this covered the twelve months ending in 604 B.C.," which view he indeed holds.

In spite of the difficulties, therefore, we understand Daniel 1:1–2 as an accurate memory and will now place it within the broader historical landscape as we can reconstruct it from other biblical texts as well as ancient Near Eastern texts, particularly the Babylonian Chronicle.¹⁴

In 609 B.C. King Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, attacked Haran, and this signaled a period of time when Babylon's efforts were directed toward Syria-Palestine with an eye focused on Egypt, who was an ally of the remnants of the Assyrians. Battles with Egyptian and Syrian armies continued in the next few years.

In 605 Nebuchadnezzar was now the head of the army in Syria. He defeated the Egyptians at Carchemish, a victory that opened the rest of Syria and Palestine to the Babylonian forces. The Babylonian Chronicle at this point mentions in a general way that Nebuchadnezzar found success in his incursions into Syria-Palestine, and it is here that we understand that he besieged Jerusalem and compelled Jehoiakim to become an unwilling vassal. Debate surrounds 2 Chronicles 36:4–8 as to whether Jehoiakim himself was temporarily deported to Babylon or whether he was only threatened with deportation. In either case, we agree with Dillard that this deportation should be "associated with the deportation of Daniel and his friends along with articles from the temple in Jehoiakim's third year after Nebuchadnezzar defeated Neco at Carchemish" (cf. Jer. 46:2). 16

The book of Daniel, of course, does not argue for the historical event; it narrates it. Indeed, even more, it intends to interpret the event for us. Human observation would lead to a very different understanding than that provided to us by the narrator of this book. On one level, it seems clear: Nebuchadnezzar, the leader of a powerful army, cowed Jerusalem, and, in a token of his dominance, took away some of the temple vessels and, as we will find out in the next section, a few of the noble youth. To the human eye, it appeared that Nebuchadnezzar had power; Judah did not.

The narrator rips away the curtain and informs his readers of the reality behind the appearance. He does so simply by saying that "the Lord delivered Jehoiakim king of Judah into his [Nebuchadnezzar's] hand." Nebuchadnezzar's might, though considerable, was not the reason why Jerusalem fell under his influence; it was the result of the will and action of God himself. This subtle phrase introduces a major theme of the book, the conflict between overweening human power and the power of God. A major concern of the book is to reinforce the belief that the sovereignty of God far surpasses the power of even the most mighty of human rulers. This theme is supported here by the use of the word "Lord" ('adonai) rather than "LORD" (yhwh) to refer to God. The former emphasizes God's ownership, his control.

It is a sign that Nebuchadnezzar's victory over Jerusalem is only the occasion for the following story that the narrator does not here even hint at the reasons why God moved against his own people in this way. As we will see later, the prayer in Daniel 9 will show that Daniel himself agreed with other biblical authors (cf. the book of Kings) that the disaster took place because of the sin of the people. There he confesses on behalf of the people that they have rebelled against God and his commandments. But here again, Nebuchadnezzar's success is reported as the occasion that brought Daniel and his three friends to the Babylonian court.

Even before telling us about the human booty, however, the narrator mentions that Nebuchadnezzar took "some of the articles from the temple of God" and placed them in the temple of his god in Babylonia.¹⁷ The specific identity of these "articles" is left unspecified.¹⁸ In Exodus, the word "article" (keli) is a general term used to designate smaller objects used to support the cultic worship in the tabernacle (Ex. 27:19; 30:27; 31:8). In the book of Kings, we occasionally hear of the "articles," as when Asa dedicated certain gold and silver articles to temple service (1 Kings 15:15), or, in an interesting parallel to our story, when Jehoash, king of Israel, attacked Amaziah, king of Judah, robbed the temple of the "articles," and carried them back to Samaria (2 Kings 14:14). 2 Chronicles 4:16 may give us an idea of the specific items included in the word keli when it lists "the pots, shovels, meat forks and all related articles." Of course, in Daniel 5 we also learn that these articles included "goblets," since Belshazzar seriously offends the Lord by using these for his banquet. Ezra 1:9–11 inventories the articles at the time of their return in consequence of Cyrus's decree, though some of these may have come from later sacks of the temple.¹⁹

In particular, our present passage anticipates the story in Daniel 5. Once again, from a human perspective, the plundering of the temple of the Lord, even if at this time only "some of the articles" were taken and placed in the Babylonian temple, could be seen as a great victory not only over Israel, but also over Yahweh himself. This act reflects a common ancient Near Eastern practice. A victorious army plundered the temple of the vanquished nation and placed the symbols of the defeated god in their own temple. An analogy is the placement of the ark in the temple of Dagon after the Philistines defeated the Israelites in battle during the youth of Samuel (1 Sam. 4–5). To the Philistines it appeared that Dagon had soundly whipped Yahweh, but subsequent events quickly changed their minds. The reality of the situation will take much longer to develop in Babylon, but the next time we see these "articles" in the hands of drunken Babylonians will be on the eve of their destruction (see comments in Dan. 5).

Training for Service (1:3–7)

BEGINNING WITH VERSE 3, the narrative focus begins to narrow. Nebuchadnezzar orders Ashpenaz,²⁰ one of his high officials, to begin the training process for the cream of the crop among the exiled youth.

We might well ask why Nebuchadnezzar would bother with the exiled youth. To answer this question we need to remember that at this time Nebuchadnezzar was trying to control Judah without actually taking it over. He has placed his puppet, Zedekiah, on the throne. His purpose with Daniel and the others was to train them in Babylonian ways for political and propaganda purposes. These members of the elite classes would become enamored with Babylonian ways and customs and either return to positions of influence at home or stay in Babylon in important positions, perhaps even serving as quasi-hostages. We can see analogies at other times in ancient Near Eastern history.²¹

Jon Berquist reminds us that Nebuchadnezzar's policy was fueled by other pragmatic considerations as well. The expanding empire required an expanding bureaucracy, which could not be met by the expertise of the native population. So the elite of subdued nations were pressed into service in the interest of Babylonian empire building.²²

We refer to Daniel, his three friends, and the others implied²³ by the passage as members of the elite class of Judah for good reasons. In verse 3, for instance, they are referred to as "some ... from the royal family and the nobility." Rabbinic tradition associates this verse with Isaiah 39:7 and asserts that Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah were descendants of King Hezekiah.²⁴ Even if not direct descendants of the king, they are nobly born in Judah.

But the qualifications for admission go well beyond right of birth. The king specified physical as well as intellectual qualities. That they were to be "young men" (y^eladim), though of imprecise age designation,²⁵ makes it hard to believe that they were over twenty and may have been much younger.²⁶

Furthermore, candidates for admission to the royal school were to have impeccable physical qualifications: "without any physical defect" as well as "handsome." The latter quality is easy to understand, though the standards of masculine beauty were possibly different. We may get a clue of what those standards are when we look at the artwork of ancient Mesopotamia²⁷ and note the well-muscled, full-bearded, luxuriantly curled hair of the warriors and kings. Or perhaps we are to picture Daniel and his friends more like the distinguished courtiers and advisors of the court.

It is the first trait ("without any physical defect") that has drawn the most discussion. The Hebrew word here (mu'wm) is known from sacrificial texts, describing the appropriate type of animal that can be offered to God (Lev. 21:17, 18, 21; 22:20, etc.). But it is not unknown elsewhere as the description of the physical perfection of a human being (e.g., Absalom [2 Sam. 14:25]; the beloved [Song 4:4]).

These men are not just good-looking and well-born, but they already show intellectual aptitude. They are "showing aptitude for every kind of learning, well informed, quick to understand." The verbs and nouns used in this description are familiar to those who have read Proverbs. Of course, in the mouth of Nebuchadnezzar the words do not carry the same ethical connotations as that book, but the narrator seems to be preparing us to recognize the four, especially Daniel, as a paradigm of the wise person.

In any case, the command of the king to his chief court official, Ashpenaz, was to train these young men in "the language and literature of the Babylonians." They were to be immersed in the culture of their enemies.

Aramaic was the native language of the Chaldean tribe that was in power in Babylon at the time, and this northwest Semitic language was becoming the lingua franca of the Near East. Nonetheless, the native language of the Babylonians was Akkadian, a Semitic language like Hebrew, but with an extremely complex writing system. It was written in syllabic cuneiform, with the additional complexity that it often utilized the ancient language of the region, Sumerian, in its technical literature. It is likely that our text has Akkadian specifically in mind in terms of the special training that Daniel and his friends were about to receive. Through archaeological discovery and philological advances, we know something of the literature of the Babylonians.²⁸ Today we have examples of historical writings, economic tablets, religious myths, heroic epics, love poetry, and more.

However, from later descriptions of Daniel's wisdom, we should highlight the importance that mantic oracles play in the Babylonia of Daniel's time. Daniel clearly would have been trained in the arts of divination through such means as interpreting unusual terrestrial and celestial phenomena, astrology, the examination of sheep livers, and so forth. Indeed, as the footnote to the NIV text points out, the Hebrew literally reads "the literature of the Chaldeans," not "the Babylonians." It is true that Chaldea, mentioned as the tribe in control of Babylonia, is another name for Babylon. However, it soon²⁹ became a byword for "magician" or "diviner," since the culture was so closely associated with this practice.

The art of divination, or reading omens, is well-attested in ancient Mesopotamia.³⁰ According to William Farber, omens were the primary way by which the gods revealed their "will, intentions, or fateful decisions to people."³¹ However, this type of divine revelation is different from what we know as biblical prophecy. Divination was a learned practice in that portended events were associated with certain signs (like symptoms of an illness), whether the shape of a liver, unusual births, the flight pattern of birds, the stars, or dreams.³² Diviners used reference books to tease out the significance of the sign. Omens could be solicited or unsolicited. In the case of dreams, they could be solicited by an incubation rite, where the subject induced sleep expectant of a significant dream. But the reference books only helped diviners interpret dreams that the subject narrated to them. They did not have the tools to discover the contents of a dream if the subject chose, for whatever reason, to withhold that information.

The bottom line is that the text is telling us that Daniel was educated in the ways of Babylon, which surely included these mantic arts. As we will see, he not only took the class, he graduated summa cum laude (Dan. 1:17, 20)!

Indeed, as we read closely in this section, we marvel at just how far Daniel and his friends are taken in the Babylonian acculturation program. In verses 6–7, we learn that their names were changed. On the surface, this may seem benign to those of us who live in a modern Western culture, where name and identity are only mildly associated. In the ancient Near East, however, the name, which often contained the name of the one's deity, was integrally connected with a person's identity. Thus, the Babylonians began the process of reeducation by giving their captives new names.

Daniel ("God is my judge") becomes Belteshazzar (either "May [a god] protect his life" or "Lady [a goddess], protect the king").³³ Azariah ("Yah is my help") becomes Abednego (probably a bastardized form of "servant of Nabu"). Hananiah ("Yah has been gracious") and Mishael ("Who is what God is?") becomes Shadrach and Meshach. The latter two Babylonian names are of debated etymology, though many³⁴ see the former as a form of the name Marduk. Though we cannot be dogmatic on the details, it appears that in their attempt to give the Judean youths a new identity and allegiance, they bestowed names that associate them with Babylonian gods. The remarkable fact is that the Hebrew youths did not choose to fight this battle.

Conceivably, the transformation may have gone further. As J. Braverman has pointed out, early rabbinic and Christian commentary on these verses concluded that Daniel and his friends literally became eunuchs at this point.³⁵ After all, many of those who worked closely with the Babylonian king were eunuchs, and Ashpenaz's title has been understood to literally mean "chief of the eunuchs." Jerome believed that Daniel and his friends here fulfilled Isaiah 39:7, "And some of your descendants, your own flesh and blood who will be born to you, will be taken away, and they will become eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon."

In the final analysis, we cannot be certain. Some have argued that their description as "without defect" precludes their castration.³⁷ However, note that within the story the evaluation is made not by an Israelite priest but by a pagan king. To Nebuchadnezzar a eunuch in the service of the court is natural. Yet we must remember that native evidence indicates that not every male who served in the court was a eunuch. On this matter, we will have to suspend final judgment.

We have passed over the one matter in our passage that will dominate the rest of the chapter, the provision of food. During their three years of training, the king "assigned them a daily amount of food and wine from the king's table" (v. 5). Since this gift triggered a striking response from our four faithful Judeans, we will reserve discussion of the nature of this food until the next section.

Avoiding Defilement (1:8–16)

UP TO THIS point, Daniel and his three friends have provided no recorded resistance to their assimilation into Babylonian society and culture. They have received new names, submitted to a foreign educational curriculum, and perhaps even have had their gender erased. All of this makes their next move all the more startling. "Daniel resolved not to defile himself with the royal food and wine" (v. 8). What does Daniel hope to accomplish by his determined stand? Why has he chosen the area of his diet as the moral and theological line over which he refuses to step?

The question is not easy to answer with confidence. Of course, our first guess would be that Daniel is firm in his commitment to the dietary laws of the Old Testament, the laws of kashrut (Lev. 11; Deut. 12:23–26). After all, the verb "defile" (ga'al) denotes religious defilement. In other words, he wants to keep kosher. However, if Daniel's intention was to keep kosher, then why did he refrain from wine? The Old Testament laws do not restrict any but the Nazirite from wine (Num. 6:1–4). Further, in their threats and warnings, the preexilic prophets implied that it was impossible, by definition, to keep kosher in the land of captivity (Hos. 9:3; Amos 7:17).

If Daniel was not motivated by the dietary laws of the Old Testament, then perhaps he was concerned about the religious overtones of the food from the king's table. In a marvelously written chapter synthesizing material from various Akkadian texts, A. Leo Oppenheim informs us about the "care and feeding of the gods." We learn here that sumptuous food would be offered to the gods, and, after their having time to enjoy the repast, whatever was left would be brought to the king's table. No Mesopotamian king is ever recorded as going hungry.

Perhaps Daniel would have been troubled by eating food that was first offered to idols, so that we can here locate his determination to avoid the food. However, Daniel does not avoid all the food of the palace. He does eat the vegetables, and we have no reason to think that these were not offered to the gods along with the meat and drink.

Baldwin and Fewell⁴¹ separately argue that the motivation was more political than theological. Of course, in the ancient world these two spheres were not completely separate. In any case, these scholars point to the use of the Hebrew word patbag (translated "food" in v. 8; cf. also 11:26 as well as the idiom "to eat at the king's table" in 1 Sam. 20:30–34; 2 Sam. 9:9–13; 19:27–29) to argue that to eat food from the king's provision was an acceptance of his covenant/treaty overlordship. By refusing the food, Daniel refuses the relationship. But again, this view falters by virtue of the fact that Daniel did not make a public display of rejecting all the king's food. Indeed, he accepted the vegetables. On the human level, he and the three friends physically survived because the king sent food from which they selectively ate the vegetables.

Rather than these doubtful reasons, we believe that the motivation lies more closely connected to the story. Daniel and his three friends are in a process of education and preparation for service. Their minds as well as their bodies are being fed by the Babylonian court. If they prosper, then to whom should they attribute their development and success? The Babylonians. However, by refusing to eat the food of the king, they know it is not the king who is responsible for the fact that "they looked healthier and better nourished than any of the young men who ate the royal food" (1:15). Their robust appearance, usually attained by a rich fare of meats and wine, is miraculously achieved through a diet of vegetables. Only God could have done it.⁴²

The diet of vegetables was a temporary regimen, as we learn from later texts that imply that Daniel at least enjoyed rich foods later in life.⁴³ Its purpose was to keep the four pious Judeans from believing that their physical appearance (and by consequence, perhaps, their intellectual gifts) were the gift of the Babylonian culture.

Another point, vitally important for later application, is often missed in the discussion. The diet was private, not public. As the four stood before Nebuchadnezzar and were pronounced the best in the class, the king could take pride in the products of his largesse. Only the Judean youths knew the truth.⁴⁴

After all, observe how they achieved their goal of a substitute diet. They made no public proclamation of their intentions. They staged no food strikes. Daniel quietly approached the chief official and asked him for permission not to partake. The chief official did not agree with them and refused to participate in their plan, but he did not reject them brusquely or violently. He could presumably have caused some trouble for the four, but the text informs us that "God had caused the official to show favor and sympathy to Daniel" (v. 9). Behind this English translation we see the same verb that we encountered in v. 2, "God gave." While the Babylonians thought they were in control of the world and local scene, the Hebrew narrative makes it clear again that the true God is the One who orchestrates events for the good of his people.

True, the chief official declines the ruse. Daniel does not panic; he does not grow angry. He simply chooses another strategy to accomplish his goal. We see here the beginnings of a theme that will develop throughout the narratives concerning Daniel. He is the incarnation of a wise man—a man who knows how to navigate life. He knows the right action for the right situation; he knows the right word to effect a godly result.

In this case, Daniel turns to the guard whom the chief official put in charge of their diet (v. 11). He proposes this time a brief ten-day test: "Give us nothing but vegetables to eat and water to drink [and not the rich fare of the king]. Then [after ten days] compare our appearance with that of the young men who eat the royal food" (vv. 12–13). Perhaps motivated in part by the fact that he could partake of the rich fare while providing the vegetables for the four Judeans, the guard agrees; the test works; and the four eat vegetables to the glory of God for three years.

Success Given to Daniel and His Friends (1:17–20)

FOR THE THIRD time in the chapter, we read that God gave something to someone. In 1:2, he gave Jehoiakim and Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar. In 1:9, God gave the chief official sympathy toward Daniel and his friends. Now (v. 17) we read that God gave the four Judeans "knowledge and understanding." Of course, Nebuchadnezzar and those involved in their education would take credit for their brilliance, but Daniel and the others would know to whom the credit was due. This section anticipates the next chapter, where the plot revolves around God's granting wisdom to Daniel through revelation (cf. 2:22). After all, they had grown physically robust not because of their Babylonian diet but because of the grace of God, that is, in spite of their diet of vegetables. The effect of the theme of "God's giving" throughout the chapter is to press home who is really in control of the events of Daniel's life, not to speak of fate of the people of God in general.

For now, however, the divine origin of Daniel's success is understood only in private by the four. Nonetheless, the effect is there for all to see. Just by talking with them, Nebuchadnezzar recognizes that Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah (note the narrator's use of the Hebrew names) are far better⁴⁵ than the professional "magicians and enchanters" of Babylon. However, the narrative has let the readers, both ancient and modern, look in on what was going on behind the scene. Thus, we might say that Daniel and his friends' actions are intended not only for themselves but as an example to all of us (see Contemporary Significance).

Commentators through the centuries have been troubled by the description of Daniel's wisdom and especially this comparison to Babylonian wisdom. In the words of Calvin, we must hold that Daniel had not been seduced to implicate himself completely in those impostures of Satan, for, as we shall soon see, he abstained from the royal food and drink. My opinion is, therefore, that whatever the king may have commanded, Daniel was content with the pure and genuine science of natural things.⁴⁶

After all, the Bible makes clear that the superiority of Israelite wisdom to Babylonian mantic wisdom is not a matter of degree, it is a matter of kind. Babylonian wise men are not so much incompetent as "false." They claim to receive their wisdom from gods whom the Israelites recognize as nonexistent—or worse, from the dark side (Deut. 18:14: "The nations you will dispossess listen to those who practice sorcery or divination. But as for you, the LORD your God has not permitted you to do so"; cf. Isa. 47).

It is too facile to say that Daniel had nothing to do with this kind of wisdom. While it is true that the four are first characterized by the kind of wisdom associated with the book of Proverbs ("knowledge and understanding"), Daniel himself is associated with a kind of mantic wisdom ("Daniel could understand visions and dreams of all kinds," v. 17). Indeed, we will see that God uses Daniel's specialized knowledge as an instrument for the revelation he gives him later in the book.

The description of Daniel here and his actions later remind us of Joseph, who played a similar role in the court of the Egyptian pharaoh. God blessed him as well with the ability to interpret dreams in a style that even this pagan monarch could recognize. And who can forget the association the narrative makes between Joseph and his divination cup (Gen. 44:5)? God can utilize even the forms of pagan wisdom for his purposes.⁴⁷ As Goldingay points out, "there is no positive theology of pagan or secular learning here, but rather the assurance that it can be triumphed over." The chapters that follow will show Daniel and his friends triumphing again and again over the false wisdom of the Babylonians, both through courtly wisdom (Dan. 3 and 6) and through mantic wisdom (chs. 2, 4, and 5 [not to speak of the second half of the book]).⁴⁹

The Extent of Daniel's Ministry (1:21)

CHAPTER 1, As we have seen, introduces the whole book of Daniel. Daniel is the wise man who, through God's grace, can navigate life's difficulties in the present and peer into the future. It is, therefore, fitting that we get an anticipation of the extent of his work. But the note comes with a difficulty. While the verse situates his life and career in the period between his arrival in Babylon until the first year of Cyrus, the Persian who defeated the Babylonians, Daniel 10:1 locates the concluding vision in the third year of Cyrus.

There are various ways to harmonize 1:21 and 10:1,50 but we should not miss the intention of the verse to identify Daniel as the prophet of the Exile. He spans the entire period, and, as J. Goldingay puts it, thus "outlasts" his conquerors.51 This message provides both encouragement and hope to those alienated from their land with the message that success without compromise was possible even in the midst of captivity.

Bridging Contexts

In the introduction to the chapter, we have already identified the overall theme of this chapter: In spite of present appearances, God is in control. Though the story focuses on the surface level on the actions of the human characters, the chapter primarily intends to teach us about God. He is all-powerful; in a word, he is sovereign. Powerful human figures like Nebuchadnezzar wield tremendous influence and, on one level, control the lives of many people, including Daniel. However, the opening chapter asserts a theme that runs throughout the book as a whole: Real power has a heavenly origin. People like Nebuchadnezzar simply serve his deeper, at times mysterious, purposes.

God's sovereignty displayed subtly but clearly here and elsewhere in the book has as an intended effect to comfort his people. From their limited human perspective, they think they are simply pawns in the hands of hostile forces. Daniel 1 circumvents that false but understandable perception by pointing them to the reality of divine sovereignty.

The teaching on divine sovereignty is the most important lesson of the chapter, but can we go further and learn from Daniel's example of godly behavior in the midst of a hostile environment? Or are his actions so limited to a particular historical occasion that it is illegitimate to transfer anything to our lives today? We have already addressed this issue in a broad way in the introduction to the book, but this is an important place to add a few comments, since we do intend to derive lessons for our lives so many years later from the life of Daniel.

Genre identification and proper interpretation. Genre identification is crucial for proper interpretation and application. We need to know what we are reading in order to understand properly the text's message and claims (if any) on our lives.

On the surface, Daniel's opening chapters appear to inform us about the past. We hear about events that shaped the fate of a whole nation when Babylon exerted its power over Judah and exiled a number of its elite class. We get an account of the first few years of certain members of that elite class as they live in the Babylonian court. We often call such reminiscences of the past "history"—a blanket term to be sure, but one that we understand and that fits with the contents of Daniel 1. Many scholars would call our label simplistic and reductionistic, and they would be correct, but we will save our nuancing for later.

Many teachers and preachers of the historical sections of the Bible make a fundamental error at this point. In their appropriate desire to make these texts touch the lives of those to whom they are speaking, they go immediately to moral teaching of the passage as they understand it. In a moment we will see this is legitimate, though filled with pitfalls. However, we must point out that the primary purpose for these texts is not to teach us how to behave, but rather to point us to God. Daniel is first and foremost a revelation of God. Now, God does not reveal himself to us in the abstract but rather in relationship to his people and through his actions in history. From the very first verses we see that this book is not essentially about Daniel, but rather about God. It is a revelation of who he is and how he acts for our redemption.⁵²

Nonetheless, neither should we ignore the didactic function of the text.⁵³ Several important questions arise as we consider this function. (1) We must address an issue that many Bible writers ask: How can history be normative? In other words, isn't history unique? God may be working in a special way during Daniel's time, but we should not uncritically read about his actions and apply them to ourselves by saying, "Go and act like Daniel!" History is a report of past events, not a blueprint for our behavior. We can marvel at God's great acts, but we cannot presume that they have any direct relationship with us today.

As we will see throughout the first six chapters of Daniel, there is much truth to this principle. We cannot assume that God acts the same way today as he did at the time of Daniel. Nor can we simply use Daniel as a model of our behavior without asking important questions of continuity or discontinuity. Yet it is equally incorrect to say that we should never use historical narrative from the Old Testament as a guide to our faith and practice today. There is a moral force to these stories of Daniel in captivity that we ignore to our great impoverishment. After all, it is in reference to stories like this one⁵⁴ that Paul stated "these things occurred as examples" (1 Cor. 10:6).

We cannot reduce any Old Testament story to a simple historical report about the past; indeed Old Testament narrative as a whole seems to have a didactic shaping.⁵⁵ That is, they incarnate principles that intend to shape the lives of those who hear these stories.

And what appears to be true of Old Testament narrative in general is pointedly true for Daniel 1–6. Indeed, its didactic function, along with the Joseph story and Esther, have been underlined by scholars who have gone so far as to classify these prose sections as wisdom literature. Wisdom literature proper (e.g., the book of Proverbs) informs its readers of the proper way to navigate life. Just as Joseph in Genesis 39 illustrates how a young man in a compromising situation should act in a way that pleases God, so Daniel and his three friends give insight and guidance to God's people as they confront oppression and the temptations of a godless life. If it is wisdom literature—and this may be doubted, it guides by showing proper behavior as opposed to describing it in the manner of a proverb.

Indeed, there is no better way to learn than by a good story. We can be inspired, encouraged, and emboldened by a story like Daniel's triumph over an impossible situation to live out our own faith with courage. After all, we are not only readers of stories; we live story.⁵⁸ Think about it. When you tell a new friend about yourself, you tell them a story. You have a beginning, a middle, and an end (which is ongoing until your death and someone else tells the story of your life). In other words, you have a plot. Your life is peopled with characters: your parents, friends, supporters, enemies. If you are a Christian, you will give the account of your conversion and your life with Christ. Thus, it is almost impossible for us as story-bearers not to compare our story with the ones we hear, like the story of Daniel.

When we tell the story of our lives truthfully, we are recounting actual events and actual people. Nonetheless, we give it meaning and purpose from the vantage point of the present. We may now see how God had a purpose in a relationship that confused us in the past; we may see patterns in our life that we did not recognize earlier. These purposes and the situation in which we are speaking will cause us to select certain high points in our life, emphasize some more than others, and interpret them all. Our stories can be both true and shaped.

The same is true of biblical history; the accounts are true, yet shaped. They have a grander purpose than mere historical recollection, but this does not denigrate their essential historical accuracy.⁵⁹ The Daniel account is shaped so that our stories may come into contact with Daniel's story with the result that we may be changed by it.

(2) How are we changed by the story of Daniel 1? Before answering that question directly, we must acknowledge that, though these "things occurred as examples" for us (1 Cor. 10:6), there are also elements of discontinuity we must take into account, both here and in the chapters to follow. While affirming a didactic element to these chapters, we must also acknowledge that Old Testament stories do more than give us examples. They are more than just individual stories that teach us how to behave; they are part of a greater story, the story of God's redemption of his people. They are a part, to use a term common among theologians, of the history of redemption. The story of Daniel is a window on the Exile, an important event in redemptive history.

God had formed a special relationship with the descendants of Abraham and had given the patriarch a promise (Gen. 12:2–3):

I will make you into a great nation, and I will bless you;
I will make your name great, and you will be a blessing.
I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse; and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you.

God later followed through on these promises. For instance, later in history Abraham's descendants had indeed become a nation, and at the time of the Exodus Moses constituted them as such. But these promises, freely given, also entailed a response of gratitude, perhaps most concretely expressed through the law later spelled out in the Ten Commandments and the case law that flowed from them. That law was accompanied by blessings and curses for obedience and disobedience. Among those curses for disobedience were some that warned of a cataclysmic judgment that could come on the people of God. Typical of these is Deuteronomy 28:64–68.

Then the LORD will scatter you among all nations, from one end of the earth to the other. There you will worship other gods—gods of wood and stone, which neither you nor your fathers have known. Among those nations you will find no repose, no resting place for the sole of your foot. There the LORD will give you an anxious mind, eyes weary with longing, and a despairing heart. You will live in constant suspense, filled with dread both night and day, never sure of your life. In the morning you will say, "If only it were evening!" and in the evening, "If only it were morning!"—because of the terror that will fill your hearts and the sights that your eyes will see. The LORD will send you back in ships to Egypt on a journey I said you should never make again. There you will offer yourselves for sale to your enemies as male and female slaves, but no one will buy you.

The prophets of the period just before the Exile warned the people of Judah that such a cataclysm threatened them because of their disregard for their relationship with God as manifest in their disobedience to the law. The author of Lamentations understood the destruction of Jerusalem as the fulfillment of this and other curses. Daniel's personal exile was an anticipation of the national catastrophe.

In other words, the story of Daniel informs the reader that Nebuchadnezzar's intrusion into Judah was not a historical accident. God gave Jehoiakim into that pagan king's hands, after all. But without denying that the Exile was indeed an experience of God's judgment, Daniel 1 also reveals that God had not abandoned his people altogether. He was not only with the faithful in exile, but as with Joseph in the Egyptian prison, God was blessing them, allowing them to succeed in what might be considered nearly impossible situations.

Continuity and discontinuity. As we will see more clearly later, Daniel 1 anticipates a theme that flows from the promise to Abraham. We begin to see what becomes explicit in the next chapter: Abraham's descendants will be a blessing to the nations.

When reading the Old Testament as history of redemption, we must be careful to read it first from the vantage point of the time of its composition. If we do not, we will easily distort its message. However, for those who read from the stance of Christian faith we must continue, because we have more of the story. Jesus himself instructed his disciples that the Old Testament had a future dimension that pointed toward himself (Luke 24:25–27, 44–49). Not that every verse or even every chapter of the Old Testament has a specific anticipation of Christ, but we must read the Old Testament, including the stories about Daniel, with an eye to the fulfillment of redemptive history in Christ.

As we read the account of Daniel in the Babylonian and, later, the Persian courts, we must acknowledge another important element of discontinuity with our moment in redemptive history. Daniel and his friends lived their lives of faith at a time when God's people were defined as an ethnic group and a distinct political entity. In a word, God's people were a nation, admittedly at the time of Daniel a nation without independent existence, but a nation nonetheless. After Christ, God's people can no longer be so identified. God's people today are the church. A much less tangible entity than a nation, the church spans ethnic, political, and national boundaries.

Unfortunately, this distinction is often lost today, especially in America, where some still think it is possible to speak of an essentially Christian nation founded on (Judeo-) Christian principles. This point is crucial for our understanding of Daniel and Daniel 1 in particular, where a fundamental issue is the relationship between faith and culture. Daniel teaches us that the struggle is not to make the culture Christian, but how a Christian can live in a hostile culture.

As we read the story of Daniel from the perspective of the New Testament and ask how we as Christians can learn from the example of Daniel, we will see how these elements of discontinuity work themselves out in such concrete instances as Daniel's bold decision not to eat the food provided by the king. Even though we have concluded that the core issue is not keeping kosher, we can learn from Acts 10 and 15, as well as 1 Corinthians 8 (cf. v. 8 "... food does not bring us near to God, we are no worse if we do not eat, and no better if we do") that preoccupation with a distinctive diet is a characteristic of the Old Testament people of God, not the New. However, the principle of continuity will drive us to ask ourselves where God is calling on us to make a stand of faith in the midst of our constantly changing culture, a prospect frightening as well as exciting.

Contemporary Significance

Daniel 1 thrusts us into an issue of contemporary significance that continues into the following chapters. For that reason, though this essay will be self-contained, we will not give an exhaustive discussion here. The reader interested in the insight that the book as a whole throws on the question of the relationship between faith and culture will have to read the commentary on the following chapters as well. Here, however, we will lay the groundwork and will refer in later chapters to the discussion found here.

God is in control. God reveals himself in the midst of the action of Daniel 1. We have seen that while on the level of human observation Nebuchadnezzar's military prowess wins the day, the Bible takes us behind the scene and shows us that God is in control. God is sovereign and he is also immanent in the world. He directs the world by his providence. This is true not only on the battlefield, but also in Daniel's classroom in the royal court. God also is the one who distributes wisdom, choosing to endow Daniel and the three friends with a special measure of it to further his purposes in history.

Relationship between faith and culture. But how does Daniel 1 address us in our everyday life? In answer, it is striking how the contemporary church finds itself in a situation similar to Daniel's. We too live in a strange land. We have seen how Daniel was taken from the shadow of the temple and forced to live in a land that worshiped idols. Babylonia under Nebuchadnezzar ultimately went further, tore down that temple in 587 B.C., and destroyed Daniel's homeland. Daniel (and the other exiles) enjoyed some measure of freedom and reputation in the land of his captivity, but he still lived in a culture that was hostile toward everything he held dear in his heart. The dichotomy between his belief and the belief of those in power is evident in this first chapter and will intensify throughout the book.

Christians today should understand that we too live in a "toxic" culture, that is, a culture that stands at odds with our faith. The god of modern culture is not the God of the Bible, but is ultimately the self. This strange god demands worship that creates values different than those of Christianity. Since the individual is at the heart of the worship of secular culture, personal gratification and self-realization are prized over any sense of the other person, any sense of community, whether that community is the family, the church, the city, the nation, or the global community.

This picture, of course, is a simplification and generalization. The world does not divide neatly into Christian and secular. Especially in this day of growing spirituality, the non-Christian world is varied. Those of us who live in big cities daily rub shoulders not only with thoroughgoing atheists and agnostics, but also with Muslims, people of Jewish faith, and those who practice a vague sort of spirituality that they refuse to put into traditional categories.

For a variety of reasons, however, the public face of our culture is predominantly secular. Since, in the United States at least, our founders thought it in the best interest of religion to keep government separate, God has become at best a buzzword in public policy and law. Moreover, because of the virtual withdrawal of Christians from the media, such things as movies, television, mainstream music, and journalism reflect the mood and opinions of those who bracket or reject God.

The lines are not always clear, but most thoughtful Christians recognize a difference between their beliefs and values and those esteemed by the culture at large. Indeed, many Christians have a sense of oppression and even hostility as they live their lives in the public square. The term culture war has recently been coined to describe the clash of values between people of faith and those who define what is right and wrong without reference to a higher being, more specifically the God of the Bible. In an insightful and provocative description of this conflict, James Davison Hunter of the University of Virginia has delineated the five fronts along which this war is waged: the family, education, popular media, law, and electoral politics.⁶¹

To highlight just one specific issue among many, note contrasting attitudes toward homosexuality. Many today believe that homosexuality is a legitimate alternative lifestyle, to be respected and treated like heterosexuality. Philadelphia, the city in which I lived until recently, has just recognized the gay partners of city employees by granting them spousal benefits. On the other side of the culture war, the place where Christians often find themselves, are those who are not ready to acknowledge homosexuality as simply an alternative to heterosexuality. In opposing what they see as a trend of "secular" culture, they believe that they protect the institution of the family, at least as traditionally defined.

The tensions are deep and more complex than I am able to describe here. Nonetheless, only the most insensitive could miss that there is a profound sense of division in our society, and Christians often find themselves out of sync with the bulk of culture.

Let me be clear at this point. I am not making a simple identification between the Christian church, or even the more narrowly defined evangelical Christian church, and the agenda of the religious right, even though the culture war in large part is defined, legitimately, as a struggle between the religious right and the rest of society. But no matter what their political orientation, whether conservative or liberal, Christians will find themselves at odds with the values and beliefs of the broader culture just by virtue of their ultimate allegiance to a God who is bigger than themselves.

What can the book of Daniel contribute to our own struggle and sense of identity in a modern secular world? Not only does it reflect a similar tension between God's people and the "world" (to use the language of Paul), it gives us insight into how we should interact with the world—and it does this in a surprising way, in part by undermining many of our current attitudes and practices. As we will see, the book does not simply give us a pattern of behavior as much as opens our eyes to multiple strategies for cultural engagement.

Many Christians today advocate only one stance toward culture: resistance. Ask a fairly knowledgeable passerby how the evangelical Christian church interacts with culture, and they will respond with one word: "coercion." The culture war often takes on the mantle of a holy war as Christians mobilize their forces to resist the encroachment of secularization against the family and society in schools, government, and media.

That picture cannot be blamed simply on the selective portrayal of the media, showing Christians participating in picket lines, blockades, and boycotts, with cameras focusing on faces shaking with rage screaming at those who are destroying God, country, and family. These reports may be sensationalized, but they are nonetheless in essence accurate. Most of these efforts at coercion target legislation, working through the democratic system, but with dangerously increasing frequency the coercion takes on the frightening dimensions of violence: abortion clinics in Atlanta bombed; a doctor shot in the back in Pensacola. Would that these were always the act of fringe Christians groups, but that would be a lie.⁶²

This is a picture of the Christian interacting with the broader society through resistance—sometimes using the tools of the democratic system, sometimes going outside of the rules. Many, including myself, would argue that this is the predominant paradigm practiced by the evangelical Christian community today. But it is not the only one by which Christian interaction with culture can be described.

In a classic study, H. Richard Niebuhr described five different patterns, and the pattern I have just described fits into the category he calls "Christ Against Culture." Culture and Christianity are two different, hostile approaches to the world. As with any assault, the church has a choice of two alternatives: fight or flight. Since the evangelical church has grown in recent years, it has often chosen to flex its muscles, but some Christians have nonetheless chosen withdrawal, fitting into a second paradigm of Niebuhr. This latter may be illustrated on an individual level by Frank, a friend of mine, who threw his television out a window when he caught a look at a music video his children were watching one night, and, in the extreme, by the approach of the Amish, who eschew much modern technology as represented by their use of horse-and-buggy rather than automobile. The wilderness areas of many of our Western states are populated by people whose faith has led them to leave the evil influences of our cities and towns.

Perhaps on the extreme opposite end of the spectrum are those Christians who embrace culture—"The Christ of Culture." This is not the route taken by the vast majority of evangelical Christians, but it is the conscious or unconscious strategy of many others. Niebuhr himself pointed to advocates of the social gospel in the earlier part of our century, and Yancey cites modern advocates of liberation theology, who understand their Bibles through the lens of Marxist political thought. It would be wrong to label such people as mere sycophants of culture. They are rather selective in their understanding of what the Bible teaches in terms of love, toleration of others, and the value of biblical justice. Many perhaps fall into this pattern because they are afraid to be different or maybe they just want to fit in.

Another of Niebuhr's categories is "Christ and Culture in Paradox." In this model church and society have separate, but legitimate spheres. We obey Christ in the church and the political leaders in our public, community life. After all, didn't Paul state as much in Romans 13:1–7? He begins by exhorting his readers to "obey the government" and continues by telling us to "pay your taxes." This advice seems reasonable until we realize that church and society often put opposing demands in front of us. Luther was Niebuhr's prime example of this approach, and the logic of his thought led to Christians who collaborated in the atrocities of Hitler during World War II. While the example of Christian Nazis is often taken as the end of the discussion since it is such a reprehensible recollection, we still have to deal with Paul's words in Romans. He does tell us to obey the government after all.

Then there is the view most frequently associated with Calvin and his intellectual descendants, the transformation of culture. Working from within culture, Christians operate as agents of positive change. Here we must comment that Niebuhr's five categories are rarely found in pure form. There is often a thin line of separation between them. Yancey offers Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658) as an example of this fifth way. Cromwell was the leader of the largely Puritan Civil War against King Charles I of England. Indeed, Cromwell did transform culture from the inside. Though he was tolerant to some other religions (Quakers, for instance), the strongly Calvinist Cromwell could also be vehemently anti-Catholic and was known to deface the statuary of churches and cathedrals, considering them idolatrous. Transformation can sometimes pass over into coercion.

We do not present the above categories with the intent to argue that one model is the biblical model. We offer them as a background on which to compare contemporary Christian strategies with Daniel's actions.

In the Original Meaning section, we observed how Daniel takes a stand and places himself against his culture. But what occasioned surprise was the extent to which he exposed himself to the pagan thinking and culture that surrounded him. Moreover, we are shocked by the great effort he took to keep his distinctiveness quiet. Daniel was no Origen, the third-century theologian, who as a young man desired to throw himself in front of the emperor's chariot and proclaim Christ so he could achieve the glory of a martyr's death. Neither was Daniel a Jerome, who fled to a monastery to avoid worldly pollution or, when feeling the unwanted arousal of sexual stimulation, would throw himself into a thorny bush.

Daniel endured much cultural assimilation, yet he knew where it was appropriate for him to draw the line of distinction. The text implies that Daniel acted in a right manner for his situation. The narrative applauds his growth in wisdom. Not only that, but as we will see in the following chapters, Daniel also had wonderful opportunities to make even bolder statements of his faith.

Once again, Daniel is not given to us as a model of the one biblical way for the believer to interact with his or her culture. Rather, when viewed in the light of the rest of Scripture, Daniel imparts the liberating, yet frightening news that there are multiple ways to be a believer in an unbelieving world. Much depends on the person and his or her specific cultural situation.

Christ and our relationship with the world. After all, what is Christ's teaching on how faith acts in the world? This is a topic that deserves booklength treatment, but I would like to bring to mind two key aspects of his teaching. Jesus calls us to be "in the world, but not of it" (cf. John 17:16), but also to be as "shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves" (Matt. 10:16).

(1) Jesus spoke a paradox when he taught that though we are "in the world" (John 17:11, 15), we are, like him, not "of it" (17:14, 16). Indeed, Jesus is the one who has sent us into the world (17:18) with the purpose that the world "may believe that you have sent me" (17:21). To use another biblical image of our involvement with the present world, we are "resident aliens" (cf. Phil. 3:20).

But notice the leeway provided in Jesus' statement. It is a general principle that can be lived out in a variety of ways. What does it mean, to take a concrete example, in the area of the education of our children? All of us who have had children have struggled with the decision of how best to educate them. Schools have a huge impact on the development of our children's thinking and life direction, and there are many who will tell you that there is one, and only one, correct answer to that question. Some will say that a Christian school is the only proper choice. We want our children not only to avoid the thinking of secular humanism found in the public school system, but also to construct a positive, biblically centered understanding of the world.

Others, some because of the lack of a Christian school option and others because they believe even the Christian schools have imbibed the spirit of the age, advocate home-schooling. Occasionally a brave soul will even suggest that the public school, with all of its potential pitfalls, is the only way to go to prevent the "ghettoization" of the church, and prepare our children for "life in the real world."

Looking at this question in the light of Christ's admonition to be "in the world, but not of it" and with an eye on Daniel's success in a truly pagan educational environment does not allow us to answer this question with dogmatism. There is no single answer to this question for all people of faith at every stage of a child's development. Too much depends on the child, the school system, the parents, the church, and so much more. We can be "in the world, but not of it" in the local public school, the Christian school, or the home school.

How many of us wish that the answer was simple and clear-cut, not only in this issue but in all the issues of faith and culture that bombard us daily. What movies and television shows are appropriate for me to watch? What magazines can I read? What music can I listen to? How protective of my children should I be?

Some may feel that we are advocating a kind of relativism here and in this way have imbibed the spirit of the day ourselves. We must be quick to say that there are some areas where our stand against culture should be clear and unequivocal in the light of biblical teaching. Though our culture permits it, it is not right to choose to have an abortion to avoid the embarrassment or the annoyance of an unwanted pregnancy. Though our culture permits it, it is not right to have an active sexual lifestyle outside of the institution of marriage. Though our culture permits it, it is not right to engage in homosexual acts of intimacy. But even here there are questions, not about our own behavior, but about our reactions to the behavior of others. What is the appropriate Christian response to the legalization of abortion? To the legitimization of homosexual relationships?

Once again we hear from Christians who say there is only one possible biblical response. Some advocate coercion through legislation or even violence as the only proper response. A note of urgency is heard from some of the leaders of the church that it is of the utmost necessity not only to refrain from sinful activity ourselves but make sure that no one in our country sins either. They point to the Old Testament and the law's demand on Israel, as a political entity, to be morally pure.

It is at this point that we need to remind ourselves that no modern nation, whether America, England, Korea, or whatever, is in a situation like Israel (see Bridging Contexts section). America is not a Christian nation; there is no such thing as a Christian nation. America is more like Babylon in Daniel's day or Rome in Jesus' day than Israel. We need to listen to the wise words of Martin Lloyd-Jones, who had the following insightful words for those who wanted to legislate Christian morality:

The New Testament is never interested in conduct and behaviour in itself. I can go further and say that the New Testament does not make an appeal for good behaviour to anyone but to Christian people. The New Testament is not interested, as such, in morality of the world. It tells us quite plainly that you can expect nothing from the world but sin, and that in its fallen condition it is incapable of anything else. In Titus 3:3 Paul tells us that we were all once like that: "for we sometimes foolish. ourselves were disobedient. deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another...." Thus there is nothing, according to the New Testament, that is so fatuous and so utterly futile, as to turn to such people and appeal to them to live the Christian life.... The truth is that it only has one message for people like that—the message of repentance.66

Lloyd-Jones gives us the healthy reminder that God is not interested in lives of external conformity to his will, but hearts that lead to thankful obedience.

(2) But this does not mean we withdraw from a dangerous and hostile world. In Matthew 10:16 Jesus calls his disciples "sheep" and the rest of the world "wolves," but he demands courage from his sheep to take the risk to live among the wolves. In the process, he gives them a strategy, using two more animal metaphors: "Therefore be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves." We are to be innocent and shrewd as we live out the issues of faith in our culture. And does this not describe Daniel perfectly? Daniel certainly was innocent. He mounted no angry assault on his captors; rather, he acted quite civilly. He was virtually serpent-like in his crafty strategy to remain faithful in a land antithetical to his deeply held faith. As the story continues, we will observe that Daniel not only remained faithful but exercised significant influence on the godless world around him. 68

Daniel 2:1-49

¹In the second year of his reign, Nebuchadnezzar had dreams; his mind was troubled and he could not sleep. ²So the king summoned the magicians, enchanters, sorcerers and astrologers to tell him what he had dreamed. When they came in and stood before the king, ³he said to them, "I have had a dream that troubles me and I want to know what it means."

⁴Then the astrologers answered the king in Aramaic, "O king, live forever! Tell your servants the dream, and we will interpret it."

⁵The king replied to the astrologers, "This is what I have firmly decided: If you do not tell me what my dream was and interpret it, I will have you cut into pieces and your houses turned into piles of rubble. ⁶But if you tell me the dream and explain it, you will receive from me gifts and rewards and great honor. So tell me the dream and interpret it for me."

⁷Once more they replied, "Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will interpret it."

⁸Then the king answered, "I am certain that you are trying to gain time, because you realize that this is what I have firmly decided: ⁹If you do not tell me the dream, there is just one penalty for you. You have conspired to tell me misleading and wicked things, hoping the situation will change. So then, tell me the dream, and I will know that you can interpret it for me."

¹⁰The astrologers answered the king, "There is not a man on earth who can do what the king asks! No king, however great and mighty, has ever asked such a thing of any magician or enchanter or astrologer.

¹¹What the king asks is too difficult. No one can reveal it to the king except the gods, and they do not live among men."

¹²This made the king so angry and furious that he ordered the execution of all the wise men of Babylon. ¹³So the decree was issued to put the wise men to death, and men were sent to look for Daniel and his friends to put them to death.

¹⁴When Arioch, the commander of the king's guard, had gone out to put to death the wise men of Babylon, Daniel spoke to him with wisdom and tact. ¹⁵He asked the king's officer, "Why did the king issue such a harsh decree?" Arioch then explained the matter to Daniel. ¹⁶At this, Daniel went in to the king and asked for time, so that he might interpret the dream for him.

¹⁷Then Daniel returned to his house and explained the matter to his friends Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. ¹⁸He urged them to plead for mercy from the God of heaven concerning this mystery, so that he and his friends might not be executed with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. ¹⁹During the night the mystery was revealed to Daniel in a vision. Then Daniel praised the God of heaven ²⁰and said:

"Praise be to the name of God for ever and ever;

wisdom and power are his.

²¹He changes times and seasons; he sets up kings and deposes them.

He gives wisdom to the wise and knowledge to the discerning.

²²He reveals deep and hidden things; he knows what lies in darkness, and light dwells with him.

²³I thank and praise you, O God of my fathers:

You have given me wisdom and power, you have made known to me what we asked of you, you have made known to us the dream of the king."

²⁴Then Daniel went to Arioch, whom the king had appointed to execute the wise men of Babylon, and said to him, "Do not execute the wise men of Babylon. Take me to the king, and I will interpret his dream for him."

²⁵Arioch took Daniel to the king at once and said, "I have found a man among the exiles from Judah who can tell the king what his dream means."

²⁶The king asked Daniel (also called Belteshazzar), "Are you able to tell me what I saw in my dream and interpret it?"

²⁷Daniel replied, "No wise man, enchanter, magician or diviner can explain to the king the mystery he has asked about, ²⁸but there is a God in heaven who reveals mysteries. He has shown King Nebuchadnezzar what will happen in days to come. Your dream and the visions that passed through your mind as you lay on your bed are these:

²⁹"As you were lying there, O king, your mind turned to things to come, and the revealer of mysteries showed you what is going to happen. ³⁰As for me, this mystery has been revealed to me, not because I have greater wisdom than other living men, but so that you, O king, may know the interpretation and that you may understand what went through your mind.

³¹"You looked, O king, and there before you stood a large statue—an enormous, dazzling statue, awesome in appearance. ³²The head of the statue was made of pure gold, its chest and arms of silver, its belly and thighs of bronze, ³³its legs of iron, its feet partly of iron and partly of baked clay. ³⁴While you were watching, a rock was cut out, but not by human hands. It struck the statue on its feet of iron and clay and smashed them. ³⁵Then the iron, the clay, the bronze, the silver and the gold were broken to pieces at the same time and became like chaff on a threshing floor in the summer. The wind swept them away without leaving a trace. But the rock that struck the statue became a huge mountain and filled the whole earth.

³⁶"This was the dream, and now we will interpret it to the king. ³⁷You, O king, are the king of kings. The God of heaven has given you dominion and power and might and glory; ³⁸in your hands he has placed mankind and the beasts of the field and the birds of the air. Wherever they live, he has made you ruler over them all. You are that head of gold.

³⁹"After you, another kingdom will rise, inferior to yours. Next, a third kingdom, one of bronze, will rule over the whole earth. ⁴⁰Finally, there will be a fourth kingdom, strong as iron—for iron breaks and smashes everything—and as iron breaks things to pieces, so it will crush and break all the others. ⁴¹Just as you saw that the feet and toes were partly of baked clay and partly of iron, so this will be a divided kingdom; yet it will have some of the strength of iron in it, even as you saw iron mixed with clay. ⁴²As the toes were partly iron and partly clay, so this kingdom will be partly strong and partly brittle. ⁴³And just as you saw the iron mixed with baked clay, so the people will be a mixture and will not remain united, any more than iron mixes with clay.

⁴⁴"In the time of those kings, the God of heaven will set up a kingdom that will never be destroyed, nor will it be left to another people. It will crush all those kingdoms and bring them to an end, but it will itself endure forever. ⁴⁵This is the meaning of the vision of the rock cut out of a mountain, but not by human hands—a rock that broke the iron, the bronze, the clay, the silver and the gold to pieces.

"The great God has shown the king what will take place in the future. The dream is true and the interpretation is trustworthy."

⁴⁶Then King Nebuchadnezzar fell prostrate before Daniel and paid him honor and ordered that an offering and incense be presented to him. ⁴⁷The king said to Daniel, "Surely your God is the God of gods and the Lord of kings and a revealer of mysteries, for you were able to reveal this mystery."

⁴⁸Then the king placed Daniel in a high position and lavished many gifts on him. He made him ruler over the entire province of Babylon and placed him in charge of all its wise men. ⁴⁹Moreover, at Daniel's request the king appointed Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego administrators over the province of Babylon, while Daniel himself remained at the royal court.

Original Meaning

Daniel 2 presents a second self-contained story—a story best remembered by the bizarrely constructed (at least by modern tastes) statue that dominates Nebuchadnezzar's dream. However, we must not let our curiosity concerning God's revelation of future events distract us from the main theme of the chapter: Only God's wisdom can reveal the mysteries of life. In other words, it is not the content of the revelation of the future that is primary; what is most important here is the fact that it is only Daniel's God that knows that future. And God's knowledge of the future is particularly important to a people in exile and under some measure of oppression, because it implies that he controls history. Once again, therefore, we are reminded of the overall theme of this book: In spite of present appearances, God is in control.

As we read Daniel 2, the Joseph narrative in Genesis 41, which closely parallels this chapter, quickly comes to mind. In Genesis a pagan king, the Egyptian pharaoh, has an anxiety-producing dream (concerning seven lean and seven fat cows). When the wise men of Egypt cannot interpret the dream for him, his cupbearer (paralleling the role of Arioch in Dan. 2) helps him discover a dream-interpreter, who turns out to be the imprisoned Joseph. Through God's help, Joseph reveals the interpretation of the dream to the pharaoh, resulting in his rise in status in the foreign court.

We thus see that Daniel is like Joseph, perhaps even better than Joseph, since he not only interprets the dream but, with God's help, actually tells the king the contents of the dream. Both Joseph and Daniel serve as models for godly behavior to God's people who live in a foreign culture (for implications see the Contemporary Significance section to Daniel 1). Goldingay nicely summarizes the lesson in regard to Daniel when he describes him as a model of Israelite wisdom (v. 14) and a model of Israelite piety, in his prayer (v. 18), his vision (v. 19), his praise (vv. 19–23), his witness (vv. 27–28), his self-effacement (v. 30), his conviction (v. 45); the fruit of his work is not merely rewards and promotion (v. 48) but obeisance and recognition of his God (vv. 46–47).²

The genre of chapter 2 has been rightly identified by W. Lee Humphreys as a "court tale of contest." The setting is the court, and the plot surrounds a contest of interpretation. The rivals are, on the surface of it, Daniel and the king's advisors, but more profoundly the contest is between the true God and the idols that the king's advisors worship.

The first contest is between Daniel and the king's advisors. The latter are confronted with a problem for which they are totally unprepared. They are diviners (baru), not seers or prophets. They deal with omens, including revelatory dreams; they do not receive revelation. In divination, the gods inform humans through the diviner's interpretation of sheep livers, abnormal births, the stars, and dreams. Dreams can be solicited through incubation rites or are unsolicited—as here apparently. They can interpret dreams, and they have books that will help them do that, but there is no way they can find out the content of the dream if the king does not tell them the actual dream.⁵ Daniel is also trained in this lore, but he is able to go further, not because of his training or the reference books he shares with the Babylonian diviners, but because his God is a God who can reveal it to him. It is at this point that the contrast between Daniel's God and the gods of the Babylonian diviners comes into play.

In this regard, we can observe another Scripture text with which Daniel 2 has special association. In Isaiah 40–48, the prophet Isaiah ridicules the nations' idols. The idols are impotent to effect history (Isa. 46:6–7):

Some pour out gold from their bags and weigh out silver on the scales; they hire a goldsmith to make it into a god, and they bow down and worship it.

They lift it to their shoulders and carry it; they set it up in its place, and there it stands. From that spot it cannot move.

Though one cries out to it, it does not answer; it cannot save him from his troubles.

The pagan advisors are blind to the future (47:13–14a):

All the counsel you have received has only worn you out!

Let your astrologers come forward, those stargazers who make predictions month by month,
let them save you from what is coming upon you.
Surely they are like stubble; the fire will burn them up.

God, by contrast, both controls history and can reveal it to his servants (46:9–10):

Remember the former things, those of long ago; I am God, and there is no other; I am God, and there is none like me.

I make known the end from the beginning, from ancient times, what is still to come.

I say: My purpose will stand, and I will do all that I please.

The outline of Daniel 2 is as follows: (1) the king and his advisors (2:1–13); (2) God's revealing of the mystery to Daniel (2:14–23); (3) the dream and its interpretation (2:24–45); and (4) the king's response (2:46–49).

The King and His Advisors (2:1–13)

SIMILAR TO DANIEL 1, this second chapter begins with a chronological note that is difficult to harmonize with our general knowledge of the period. A definite answer eludes us again, though we are able to provide a possible harmonization.⁶

The first verse sets the scene in the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, whereas the first chapter says that Daniel's training lasted for three years (1:5). Even assuming (as we argued in ch. 1) that the training began in Nebuchadnezzar's accession year, this is difficult to reconcile with 2:1. After all, since Daniel was included among the condemned "wise men" (2:14) and was living outside the court, the assumption is that he had already graduated.

Both Wood and Young offer different explanations to resolve the tension. The former suggests a scenario in which chapter 2 describes events that took place during Daniel's training.⁷ The latter argues that if we accept that three years may include partial years, the two chronological notes can be reconciled. He provides the following chart to make his point clear:⁸

Year of Daniel's training Nebuchadnezzar

First year Year of Accession

Second year First year

Third year Second year (in which dream occurred)

We have commented on these historical conundrums because they cause close readers to stumble. The purpose of the chronological markers, however, is not primary to the story. They merely set the scene; having addressed the issue, we pass on to the message of the passage.⁹

Nebuchadnezzar had a dream that disturbed him greatly, so he called his professionals—not psychologists, of course, but the ancient equivalents, "the magicians, enchanters, sorcerers and astrologers." These professionals had dream interpretation on their list of responsibilities. Indeed, these people were the political consultants, trend spotters, and religious gurus of the day.

Babylonian religion encouraged looking for portents of the future in dreams and the fantastic occurrences of everyday life. Indications of future trends and events could be found in the skies, bizarre births, the shape of animal livers, and—as here—in dreams. It is in the latter that Babylonian religion and Daniel's faith come closest, and perhaps that is why God chose to speak to Nebuchadnezzar in this way rather than through the birth of a multiheaded ox. After all, God had spoken through dreams in the past (e.g., Gen. 28:10–22; 1 Kings 3:5), but not through other means of divination so popular in Babylonia.

The difference between these modes of revelation is profound, and in this difference we see a radical contrast between the false religion of the Babylonians and the true religion of Daniel. Biblical prophecy, which occasionally includes dreams, is the result of divine initiative and revelation; the other means of divination, practiced so strenuously by the Babylonians but condemned by the Bible (cf. Deut. 18:14), is the result of human initiation or manipulation (i.e., the pouring of oil in water). Dream interpretation is one mode of divine revelation understood by Babylonians¹⁰ and accepted by pious Israelites.

But even with royal dreams in Babylon, there was a protocol that allowed for interpretation. It required the king to inform the professional interpreters of the content of his dream, but Nebuchadnezzar angrily refuses to satisfy the interpreters' urgent pleas to tell them the contents of his dream; this refusal puts the diviners in an awkward, even dangerous situation.

The biblical text does not clearly state why Nebuchadnezzar refuses to describe the contents of the dream to his interpreters, leading to two different understandings of his motivation." Some commentators believe

Nebuchadnezzar has forgotten the dream. He is disturbed, knows he has had a dream, but does not remember exactly what the dream is about.¹² Such a view, however, does not do justice to the anger of the king.¹³ His reaction to the diviners' request to supply them with the content of the dream indicates that Nebuchadnezzar is testing their integrity. He realizes how easy it is to provide an interpretation of a symbolic dream and wants to assure himself of their authenticity by demanding that they also tell him something that only he himself knows, the actual contents of the dream.¹⁴

In spite of the reason, however, no doubt attends the divine intention that stands behind the royal stubbornness. In their exasperation, the diviners themselves utter the statement that sets up the main lesson of the chapter: "There is not a man on earth who can do what the king asks! No king, however great and mighty, has ever asked such a thing of any magician or enchanter or astrologer. What the king asks is too difficult. No one can reveal it to the king except the gods, and they do not live among men" (Dan. 2:10–11). With that, the king orders all the "wise men" in Babylonia, present in the court or not, put to death. The glove is thrown to the ground; Daniel and his friends are put on the chopping block. How will God resolve this dangerous situation?

God's Revealing of the Mystery to Daniel (2:14–23)

ARIOCH, THE COMMANDER of the king's guard, has no choice but to follow through on Nebuchadnezzar's command to execute the wise men. His mission leads him to Daniel, who, being a wise man himself, is included among those scheduled for death.

Arioch's words may have shocked Daniel, but the text does not inform us that he reacts that way. As in the first chapter when his strategy for remaining faithful in a hostile court was thwarted, Daniel responds calmly and with confidence. He navigates life "with wisdom and tact" (v. 14) even when, as in this case, confronted with a threat of gargantuan proportions. Daniel is truly the paradigmatic person of wisdom.

Arioch informs Daniel on the situation that brings him to his doorstep. Daniel hears of the king's dream, the interpreters' inability to discern its contents and their impotence in interpretation. After winning some time, he returned to his house, where he meets with his three friends, here given their Hebrew names: Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. He knows that they have only one recourse, prayer. The Babylonian sages were only half right. While no human being could ever tell the king the contents and interpretation of his dream, God can, and, in contrast to the beliefs of the Babylonians (2:11), there is a God who lives among people: Daniel's God.

The four faithful Israelites prayed to God to reveal the "mystery" to them. In general, a mystery is something beyond human comprehension. In this context, of course, it has become painfully obvious that Nebuchadnezzar's dream is such a mystery. If Daniel and the others are to have their lives spared, God will have to tell them what to say. That night Daniel's God speaks to him and describes to him the dream and its interpretation. Before rushing off to the court, Daniel prays again—this time not a petition for help, but a thanksgiving song.¹⁵

In his prayer, Daniel highlights two aspects of God's character that play a pivotal role in this chapter, and indeed throughout the book. (1) God is powerful. Babylon and Nebuchadnezzar, its king, seem to have all the power on the human plane. They presume to have control over Israel and Daniel, but the prophet recognizes the truth of the matter. Nebuchadnezzar himself is a king because God is the One who "sets up kings and deposes them" (2:21).

(2) God is wise. Indeed, Daniel understands that his wisdom is derivative from God's. The revelation of the mystery has made that clear. The "wisdom and tact" that we earlier saw him display toward Ashpenaz and then Arioch might be confused with the common sense available to any sensitive human being, but the ability to describe someone else's dream can only come from a divine source. He is the One who "reveals deep and hidden things" (2:22).

Armed with this answer to prayer,¹⁶ Daniel then sets out with Arioch to the royal court.

The Dream and Its Interpretation (2:24–45)

AFTER THANKING GOD for hearing his prayer, Daniel informs Arioch that he has the answer needed to preserve the wisdom teachers, including himself, from Nebuchadnezzar's decree of death. Calvin devotes some time to justifying Daniel's haste. After all, these wise men teach falsehood and advocate idolatry; in Calvin's opinion, they deserved to die, even if not for the reason that moves Nebuchadnezzar. Calvin appeals to Daniel's sense of honesty to justify his letting the idolaters off the hook. Daniel would have preferred their death, but not for unjust reasons. Against Calvin, we would suggest that Daniel's actions here and elsewhere in the book incarnate a love for enemies (Ex. 23:4–5) that the Old Testament mandates and Jesus later advocates (Luke 6:27).

Arioch brings Daniel into the presence of Nebuchadnezzar. The king gets right to the point: "Are you able to tell me what I saw in my dream and interpret it?"

Daniel responds in a way that puts the focus where it belongs, not on himself but directly on God. This solution has been anticipated by the inability of the Babylonian wisdom teachers, who said that the answer could only come from the divine realm (v. 11). Now Daniel bears witness to the God who speaks the life-granting answer; he is the "God in heaven who reveals mysteries" (v. 28). He then proceeds with a description of the content of the king's vision. The report of the dream is given first, followed by its interpretation. However, even within the description are indications of the interpretation. In particular, Daniel makes it clear that the vision concerns the future (vv. 28–29).

The dream is of a huge statue. As Collins points out, "apparitions of gigantic figures are characteristic of ancient Near Eastern dreams." Besides its size, the statue is striking by virtue of its composition. Its head is gold; its chest and arms silver, while its belly and thighs are bronze and its legs iron. The feet are themselves composite, made of both iron and clay. While in one sense there is nothing exactly like this composite statue in ancient literature, we can note similarities. There is a tradition of recounting world history by means of metals of declining value as early as Hesiod in his Works and Days, composed in the eighth century B.C.¹⁹

The statue is not the only character in the vision. Daniel next describes a rock whose origins are mysteriously described in a negative way, made "not by human hands" (v. 34). Our first thought is that if it is not human, it must be divine, but confirmation awaits the interpretation that follows.

With two characters, we now have a plot. The rock smashes into the feet of the statue, which is obviously the weak link. This imposing figure is thus reduced to near nothingness, so that the wind can blow it away. After this, the rock becomes a huge mountain, filling the whole world.

In verse 36, Daniel moves from dream report to dream interpretation, and we begin on solid interpretive ground. Speaking to Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel says, "You are that head of gold" (v. 38). Nebuchadnezzar must have rejoiced at this news. After all, in the scheme of "things to come" he was at the top, represented by the most precious of all metals. In the light of this news, it is hard to see why some commentators wonder why Nebuchadnezzar responds so well to the dream as a whole. While the head of gold will be replaced and eventually pass away, nonetheless for the moment Nebuchadnezzar is on top. His reaction may be compared to that of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:19) when he heard that, despite hardships to come to his descendants, his own reign would be characterized by "peace and security."

After Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel interprets the remaining metals as symbolic of nations rather than individual kings.²⁰ The identity of the following kingdoms has been much debated over the centuries, particularly in the past hundred years. The interpretation of the kingdoms of Daniel 2 is closely related to the interpretation of Daniel 7 (the four hybrid beasts), which in turn is related to the identity of the goat and the ram in Daniel 8. In order to get a more complete explanation of the interpretive stance we are taking in Daniel 2, the reader is encouraged to read the comments on those relevant chapters as well.

Historically, two main approaches have dominated: the Greek view and the Roman view. The latter is understood to be the traditional viewpoint and often appeals to the New Testament for support. This approach sees the following pattern:

Head of gold = Nebuchadnezzar (Babylon) Arms and chest of silver = Medo-Persian empire Belly and thighs of bronze = Greek empire Legs of iron = Roman empire

This view is held by conservative scholars in the main; nonconservatives have trouble with this approach because even they, for the most part, believe Daniel 2 was written before Rome was a major player on the world scene. Since (in their view) predictive prophecy does not occur,²¹ they cannot believe that the fourth kingdom is Rome. Typically, then, in the Greek view, the Medes and the Persians are treated as the second and third kingdoms respectively. The Greek kingdom is fourth. The mixed character of the toes then refers to the political situation in Egypt and the Levant after the death of Alexander, when the Ptolomies and the Seleucids vie for control of Palestine. More specifically, the attempts at mixture in verse 43 is a symbolic reference to attempts at intermarriage.²²

However, the interpretive situation is not as clear as the last paragraph might lead us to believe. It is not simply a matter of all traditional-conservative scholars holding to the Roman view and all nonconservatives arguing for the Greek view. Recently, strong evangelical arguments have been put forward for the Greek view.²³ Furthermore, there is significant disagreement among conservative interpreters concerning such details as the significance of the ten toes.²⁴

In the light of this interpretive confusion, we must entertain seriously the idea that the vision of Daniel 2 does not intend to be precise as it writes its history before it occurs. In other words, though it starts in the concrete present, it is a wrong strategy to proceed through history and associate the different stages of the statue with particular empires. The vision intends to communicate something more general, but also more grand: God is sovereign; he is in control despite present conditions.

Not allowing ourselves to be distracted by the above debate, we notice some crucial theological principles in the dream.²⁵ We see, for instance, that the unnamed kingdoms that follow the head of gold will be inferior to Babylon. While human beings operate on the idea that we get better and stronger with time, God's vision undercuts our understanding, informing us that the opposite is true. Gold gives way to silver, which then becomes bronze, iron, and a weak mixture of clay and iron. A statue that starts out in grandeur and beauty ends in weakness. Indeed, the expression "feet of clay" has become an idiom in our language for a point of weakness in an otherwise strong person or institution.

The other important principle in this dream-vision is seen when this statue is contrasted with the object of its demise, the rock. The statue is an object made with human hands and ingenuity. The rock, however, is explicitly said not to be the result of human intention or energy. In the interpretation, Daniel identifies the rock as "God's kingdom." The rock obliterates these human kingdoms. In this way, Daniel again speaks to God's oppressed people that the evil they now experience is not the end of the story. In spite of present appearances, God will defeat the forces that rule over them. And not only that, God's kingdom will expand and take over the world, just as the rock becomes a huge mountain. With Calvin, we affirm that "Daniel is not relating what was going to be completed in one moment; he just wants to teach that the kingdoms of the world are transient and that there is only one eternal kingdom."²⁷

The King's Response (2:46–49)

Daniel's Ability to describe and interpret his dream overwhelms the Babylonian king. He responds with worship, falling prostrate, making an offering, and burning incense. But to whom is his worship offered? In verse 46 Nebuchadnezzar bows toward Daniel and presents him with offerings and incense. One might expect Daniel to have a near heart attack and virtually grab the king and bring him to his feet, but the passage does not tell us that he objects to this treatment. Indeed, he quietly accepts the gifts and promotion mentioned in verse 48. As a matter of fact, he uses his good position to leverage his three friends to important positions as well. These new positions lead to the jealousy of native officials, which results in the conflicts in chapter 3.

No, Daniel seems quietly to accept what at least appears to be worship offered to him by Nebuchadnezzar. This behavior contrasts sharply with Paul and Barnabas in Lystra (Acts 14:8–20). After healing a lame man, the townspeople treated them as Zeus and Hermes, and the apostles reacted quickly, tearing their clothes and urgently shouting, "We too are only men!"

Appeal is often made to a speech by Alexander when he bowed before the high priest of Yahweh in Jerusalem, but when questioned stated, "It was not before him that I prostrated myself but the God of whom he has the honour to be high priest." Indeed, we must understand verse 46 in the light of verse 47, where Nebuchadnezzar praises the power behind Daniel. God is "God of gods and the Lord of kings and a revealer of mysteries." Daniel is honored because of what his God has done, not because of what he has done. However, we must not be misled to think that Nebuchadnezzar is converted here. As a good polytheist, Nebuchadnezzar was more than willing to acknowledge the power of foreign deities. He could easily incorporate Yahweh into his pantheon and give him the credit due him at the moment.

Nonetheless, the parallel with Alexander does not explain Daniel's passive reception of Nebuchadnezzar's worship. Perhaps Daniel did react in the way Paul did at Lystra, but the often reticent Hebrew narrative does not inform us of this.²⁹ However, it is more likely to be explained by the comment that "in the world in which the author of Daniel lived a benefactor could be treated like this without impiety, and Nebuchadnezzar is simply expressing in an extravagant way his great gratitude for the very considerable service which Daniel has done him."³⁰

Whatever reason we give, the concluding scene gives us a powerful picture that reinforces the theme of our book: The most powerful pagan in the world lies prostrate before an exiled Jew. Chills of excitement and the flames of hope will rise in the hearts of those who identify with Daniel and his God.

Bridging Contexts

THE CHAPTER OPENS with Nebuchadnezzar's uneasiness with a dream. On a surface reading, the core issue of the story seems tightly focused on the meaning of the dream. Once Daniel describes and interprets the dream, we learn that it concerns the future rise and fall of kingdoms. What could be more fascinating to a modern reader than a divine glimpse at the future? Thus, many readers fix their rapt attention on the dream and its interpretation.

However, as we mentioned in the Original Meaning section, the core concern was not the content of the dream or even its interpretation, but on Daniel's God-given ability to interpret the dream. This is not to claim that the message of the dream is unimportant, but certainly the focus is on the context between the Babylonian wise men and Daniel. Where the "magicians, enchanters, sorcerers and astrologers" of Babylon failed, Daniel succeeded. Why? The text is structured to highlight the answer to this question, and in his prayer, Daniel articulates it well (2:23):

I thank and praise you, O God of my fathers: You have given me wisdom and power, you have made known to me what we asked of you, you have made known to us the dream of the king.

Only God's wisdom, according to Daniel 2, can reveal the mysteries of life. Human wisdom falls short.

In this way, Daniel 2 contributes to a biblical theology of wisdom that begins early in the Old Testament and continues into the New. Understanding the contours of that theology not only helps us understand chapter 2, but also permits us to see its continuing relevance to Christians today. We cannot hope to do more than scratch the surface here, though even a brief survey will prove informative.

Wisdom in the Old Testament. When we think of biblical wisdom, we normally think of the book of Proverbs. If we are not careful, however, this book can be misread and mislead us into thinking that wisdom is something that human beings attain by hard work alone. We may also be deluded into thinking that human wisdom is the key to earthly success:

Listen, my son, to your father's instruction and do not forsake your mother's teaching. They will be a garland to grace your head and a chain to adorn your neck. (Prov. 1:8–9)

The first nine chapters of Proverbs exhort us to learn, remember, pay attention, listen well, and avoid the way of the evil fool. In chapters 10 and following we read many pithy proverbs about the wise path and its attendant rewards and about the way of the fool and its dire consequences. Proverbs 12:11 gives us a classic illustration:

He who works his land will have abundant food, but he who chases fantasies lacks judgment.

As we read the book of Proverbs, we can easily get the mistaken impression that wisdom involves the memorization and application of certain proverbs that make little direct reference to God or theology. These proverbs may ultimately be God's wisdom, but only in some distant way. An unfortunate consequence of this contemporary misreading of Proverbs is that the book is often misused as the ultimate in self-help manuals, a guide to how to be healthy and successful in a chaotic world.

Such a misunderstanding of Proverbs arises because of our modern tendency to read the book in pieces rather than as a whole. It is true that many of the proverbs in chapters 10–31 seem more like common sense based on experience, rather than the type of revealed wisdom Daniel received in answer to his prayer. But once again, we must appeal to the structure of the book of Proverbs and to the effect it has on our reading of any part of it.

The first nine chapters of Proverbs are the theological grid through which we must read each individual maxim. Running throughout chapters 1–9 is a contrast between two concepts: Wisdom and Folly. These concepts are personified at important points as two women, vying for the attention of the reader, who, in its ancient setting, is assumed to be a male. This contrast, anticipated as early as the first chapter (cf. 1:20–33), comes to a dramatic climax in chapter 9. Here, Lady Wisdom and Dame Folly appeal to men who are passing by their homes and invite them in for a meal.

The imagery is clear and powerful. The reader is asked to enter into an intimate relationship with one of two women: Wisdom or Folly. Who are these women? Their homes are located on the high point of the city. Only deities have their homes on the hill in the ancient Near East. While Folly stands for the false gods that tempt God's people, so Wisdom is Yahweh himself. In other words, the proverbs of the book are not just common sense or based on experience; they are rather the result of a relationship with God. What, after all, is the origin of wisdom according to the book of Proverbs: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1:7).

That Proverbs was and is misread in the way we have suggested is confirmed by the presence of two other wisdom books in the Old Testament. In the first place, Job's three friends incarnate the perverse misreading of Proverbs by their mechanistic and "health-and-wealth" understanding of life. Job is in trouble; he suffers horribly. What is their proposed solution? "Get wise; you must have sinned, so get right with God."

Job is well-characterized as a wisdom debate.³¹ It is not only the three friends who believe they have wisdom, but Elihu and even Job himself.

They each believe they have something of a grasp on the problem; they each argue against the interpretation and solution of the others.

But the lesson comes at the end of the book. Once again, wisdom is not a concept to be learned; it is a relationship to be enjoyed (see "The New Testament and wisdom," where this will be fleshed out). Where is wisdom to be found? Not through human effort but, again, "the fear of the Lord—that is wisdom, and to shun evil is understanding" (Job 28:28). The pop quiz that God gives Job at the end has as its point that wisdom is with God and he reveals it to whom he wills.

Space does not permit a detailed treatment of the second wisdom book that serves to correct a misreading of proverbial wisdom in the Old Testament, but Ecclesiastes contributes in much the same way as Job.³² Wisdom, says the Teacher, is not the ultimate solution. Indeed, he spent much of his life striving to be wise, and his conclusion, "Meaningless! Meaningless!... Everything is meaningless" (12:8). At the end, a second voice is heard. This voice does not urge harder work, but once again a relationship (Eccl. 12:13–14):

Now all has been heard;
here is the conclusion of the matter:
Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.
For God will bring every deed into judgment, including every hidden thing,
whether it is good or evil.

Our survey of key Old Testament wisdom passages confirms what we learned from the book of Daniel. Contrary to modern misunderstandings, wisdom has a divine origin, not a human one. The minor key of books like Job and Ecclesiastes also warn us that true wisdom's reward is not always in this world, though Proverbs informs us that wisdom and success sometimes accompany one another. In the case of Daniel 2, it is the latter that is the case, for the chapter closes with Nebuchadnezzar stretched out on the floor, giving honor to God's servant. When we turn to the next chapter, however, we see that this success is short-lived. Daniel and his friends did not demand human reward for their obedience (see comments on Dan. 3).

Our survey has also taught us something implicit about wisdom in Daniel 2, but which is explicit elsewhere. The divine origin of wisdom means that at its foundation wisdom is not a lesson to be learned but a relationship to be enjoyed. Daniel's wisdom, contrary to that of the learned Babylonian astrologers, did not come from books of dream interpretation; instead, it came from a conversation, a prayer, with God himself.

The New Testament and wisdom. The apostle Paul came to understand the divine origin of wisdom. When he was young, he studied hard under Gamaliel, a well-known rabbi, and he worked hard at being a good follower of God (Acts 22:3–5). He heard about those who followed Christ, and he considered them utter fools; his mission in life was to destroy the fledgling church through his intellect and even through violence.

According to his own testimony, however, God opened his eyes, so that he saw the source of true wisdom, God himself. He knew, of course, how the world counted wisdom. It was not through revelation but through vast learning. Indeed, his later reflections in 1 Corinthians 1:18–2:16 sound like a Christian reflection on Daniel 2. 1 Corinthians 1:20 could be the motto: "Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world?"

Paul realized, as Daniel did before him, that true wisdom is not the result of years of reading or even living life; rather, true wisdom is the result of a relationship, a relationship with the God who created and rules over the world. The apostle, chosen by God to testify to great acts of redemption, could speak more precisely than Daniel. If asked about the source of wisdom, he would reply: Jesus Christ. This is what he means at the crescendo of his great discourse on the difference between true wisdom and the wisdom of this world (1 Cor. 2:10b–16):

The Spirit searches all things, even the deep things of God. For who among men knows the thoughts of a man except the man's spirit within him? In the same way no one knows the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God. We have not received the spirit of the world but the Spirit who is from God, that we may understand what God has freely given us. This is what we speak, not in words taught by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words. The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned. The spiritual man makes judgments about all things, but he himself is not subject to any man's judgment:

"For who has known the mind of the Lord that he may instruct him?"

But we have the mind of Christ.

We have the mind of Christ. We have a relationship with Jesus Christ, God's own divine Son, in whom "are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3). Jesus is wisdom himself (1 Cor. 1:30). For us to be wise, we must be united with him. Understanding this is crucial to our application of the message of Daniel 2 to our lives today at the turn of the second millennium A.D.

The dream itself. Before we do so, however, we must return to the occasion that led to God's powerful and public display of his wisdom—Nebuchadnezzar's dream. While we were right to deflect the type of obsessive interest in the future that focuses on the statue's meaning as the primary meaning of Daniel 2, we would be equally wrong to ignore it altogether. As readers have long noted, Daniel 2 bears many similarities to the scheme of Daniel 7. Indeed, this chapter is unique in the first half of the book with respect to the interest in the future that it shares with the second half of the book. We will, therefore, reserve discussion of some of the key aspects of the dream for that part of the book that focuses on the future as a major concern (the interested reader should consult especially the comments on ch. 7, but also 8, 10–12).

For now, we will highlight one crucial detail of the dream. The dream of the successive world empires succumbing to the power of a rock said to represent God's "kingdom that will never be destroyed" (2:44). This dream supports the overall message of the book, repeated in different ways many times: Though circumstances appear to favor the power of ungodly human personalities and institutions, God will overpower them. Perhaps the most significant contribution of this vision is the note that this devastating rock was cut out of the ground "not by human hands" (2:34). The fact that God's kingdom is established apart from human efforts is an important topic as we turn to our own life situations today.

Contemporary Significance

It is possible to derive a formal difference between the kind of wisdom Daniel displays in chapter 2 and that which he shows in chapter 1. In chapter 1 Daniel's wisdom is similar to the kind of wisdom we find in the book of Proverbs: street smarts, knowing how to navigate life in the midst of its troubles and obstacles, based on experience and what works. Daniel ran into a roadblock in his desire to avoid the food of the king's table, so he thought of a better strategy to achieve his end, and it worked. In Daniel 2, the kind of wisdom he displayed is more striking from a human perspective. His insight into Nebuchadnezzar's dream constituted what scholars call mantic wisdom. Daniel did not know the contents and interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream by virtue of looking through the prism of God's Word at past experience and applying it to a present circumstance. He knew it because God told him directly in response to a prayer.

The source of true wisdom. Today Christians debate whether such wisdom as that found in Daniel 2 is available to God's followers. On the one hand, some Christians feel a strong continuity with God's people of the biblical period and ask why we shouldn't believe that God still speaks directly and specifically to people today. How can we deny the possibility that God can speak through our dreams or reveal something in a special way to us today?³³ Other Christians, and I would include myself here (though with great respect to my brothers and sisters on the other side of the issue), note a strong connection between the giving of special revelation with the great acts of God that accomplished redemption. These acts came to a conclusion with the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ; thus, after the completion of that divinely revealed record and the interpretation of that great climactic act, God now speaks to us through his completed revelation, the Bible, rather than in sporadic dreams or prophetic utterances.

Space does not permit an elaborate discussion of this issue,³⁴ but what if I am correct and God does not normally speak to us in the same way as he spoke to Daniel in chapter 2? Does that make this chapter irrelevant to us?

Not at all. I hope I have demonstrated in the Bridging Contexts section that, while it is possible to speak of a formal difference between the type of wisdom displayed in Daniel 1 and 2, substantially they are the same. It isn't as if the wisdom of Daniel in chapter 2 comes directly from God and the wisdom of chapter 1 is based on human experience apart from the divine. The latter wisdom, like the wisdom of Proverbs, is not based on common sense or experience of life; rather, it too has God as its ultimate and only source. Both types of wisdom, mantic and principal, derive from a relationship with God. For the Christian, we may state it in this manner: all wisdom comes from the One in whom "are hidden all the treasure of wisdom" (Col. 2:3), namely, Jesus Christ.

In light of these passages, even the wisdom displayed by non-Christians has to be understood as a gift of God, in what the theologians call "common grace." If we desire wisdom to live in a chaotic and confusing world, then the message of the Bible is to enrich our relationship with Christ.

We live in an increasingly complex and confusing world. With every new and improved technological advance, we are told that our lives will be simpler and easier. That's the hype, but when we buy our computer, log onto the Internet, or get our cellular phone, we find a whole host of new questions and obstacles facing us there. Where will we find the wisdom necessary to live in a world of growing complexity? Many think it is through intelligence, which we often confuse with wisdom. To get on in a world of technology, even to get a decent career, we think that knowledge, advanced degrees, and high IQs are the ticket to success and happiness in living.

Indeed, as a professor and a Ph.D. myself, I have a hard time discouraging a person's desire to gain knowledge about the Bible, about ourselves, or about our world. However, I will be the first to argue that there is no equation between one's intellect and happiness and success in life. The most intellectual people are often the worst in relationships and living a daily life. Even more, the smartest people don't always succeed in the job market either, including a heady profession like education. How often have we heard it. "My teacher is really smart but she does not know how to communicate." Or, "My boss really knows his stuff, but he certainly can't relate to his employees."

In a remarkably revealing book, Daniel Goleman counters the popular idea that a high IQ indicates a person will have the world at his or her fingertips.³⁵ His concluded that "a high IQ is no guarantee of prosperity, prestige, or happiness in life." He cites a study of college graduates with varying IQs, which showed no correlation between their Intelligence Quotient and their "salary, productivity, or status" or their "happiness with friendships, family, and romantic relationships." His conclusion is that "at best, IQ contributes about 20 percent to the factors that determine life success, which leaves 80 percent to other forces."³⁶

That Goleman hit a nerve in our society was indicated that his book has enjoyed many months on the New York Times best-sellers list. The significance of his study for us is that he has simply stumbled across a truth stated long ago by the Bible. Biblical wisdom is more than a knowledge of facts, it is a more like a skill (a "knowing how" rather than a "knowing that") based on our relationship with Jesus Christ. Wisdom is a divinely given ability to have insight as to the best way to live life.

After his critique of IQ as the road to success, Goleman introduces the vital importance of what he calls "emotional intelligence." Again, what is striking is its uncanny similarity to biblical wisdom. Emotional intelligence goes well beyond the facts, for it "includes self-control, zeal and persistence and the ability to motivate oneself." He expands this concept later in his book when he includes in emotional intelligence "abilities such as being able to motivate oneself and persist in the face of frustration; to control impulse and delay gratification; to regulate one's moods and keep distress from swamping the ability to think; to empathize and to hope." 38

This is fine and good, but the question is, "How in the world can I do this? Regulate my moods? Control my impulses? Delay gratification? I would if I could!" Goleman gives practical suggestions for child rearing and depends heavily on the idea that once we see the benefits of our more reasonable behavior, we will conform. Most of us, however, cannot control ourselves in the way he suggests—on our own power.

Relationship with Christ. Goleman identifies the problem and points us in the right direction, but he does not provide the solution. Biblical wisdom goes much further. It points to the solution: a power greater than we are and outside of ourselves. This is a relationship with Jesus Christ.

What does this mean in practical terms? It means we live life in a troubled and confusing world in relationship with Christ. We gain our wisdom in conversation with him. And how do we converse with Christ? Through prayer and reading his Word. Through prayer we enhance our relationship with him through praise, and we draw on his wisdom through sharing our problems and confusion. We then listen to his answer as he speaks to us through the Bible.

The Bible, however, must be understood as more than a list of principles to be memorized and then applied in a mechanical way. It takes a wise person to know the time and place to put into practice a biblical principle stated in Proverbs. A misapplied proverb can be a horrible thing (Prov. 26:7, 9):

Like a lame man's legs that hang limp is a proverb in the mouth of a fool....

Like a thornbush in a drunkard's hand is a proverb in the mouth of a fool.

But a proverb applied correctly is cause for great joy (15:23):

A man finds joy in giving an apt reply—and how good is a timely word!

Wisdom is a relationship that produces a mindset, a way of looking at the world. Indeed, it looks at life through the eyes of Christ. It does not stop with the memorization of biblical verses.

In Daniel 2, God used Daniel to display his own wisdom. Though Nebuchadnezzar in his spiritual blindness (or at least serious nearsightedness) bowed before Daniel, the reader knows that God is the one who deserves the praise for the miracle of interpretation. But it is not only for the act of interpretation itself, but its content as well. The dream taught that although evil human kingdoms will dominate for a season, the ultimate victory will go to God. It is his kingdom that will be established. The rock, cut without human hands, will not only crush the statue but it will grow to mountain-like proportions.

Who is the rock? The symbolism is multifaceted, but readers of the New Testament cannot help but think of Jesus Christ as the rock who establishes God's kingdom by crushing godless nations. It is true that the tradition that identifies Jesus as the rock derives also from Psalm 118:22 (Matt. 21:42; Mark 12:10–11; Luke 20:17; 1 Peter 2:7) and Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16 (Rom. 9:33; 1 Peter 2:6, 8), but we get a clear reference to Daniel 2 in Luke 20:18. The context is the parable of the tenants (Luke 20:9–19). The parable is the story of an vineyard (often a symbol of God's kingdom)³⁹ rented to tenants, who then refuse to pay. The owner sends messengers to collect the rent, but they are beaten and chased off. Finally, the owner sends his son, but the tenants do the unspeakable and kill the son. At that point, the owner returns himself, kills the tenants, and gives the vineyard to others.

In a clear attempt to identify himself with the son and his listeners with the doomed tenants, Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22: "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone," and then immediately associates this stone with the stone of Daniel 2 "Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken to pieces, but he on whom it falls will be crushed" (Luke 20:18).

Daniel 3:1–30

¹KING NEBUCHADNEZZAR MADE an image of gold, ninety feet high and nine feet wide, and set it up on the plain of Dura in the province of Babylon. ²He then summoned the satraps, prefects, governors, advisers, treasurers, judges, magistrates and all the other provincial officials to come to the dedication of the image he had set up. ³So the satraps, prefects, governors, advisers, treasurers, judges, magistrates and all the other provincial officials assembled for the dedication of the image that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up, and they stood before it.

⁴Then the herald loudly proclaimed, "This is what you are commanded to do, O peoples, nations and men of every language: ⁵As soon as you hear the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music, you must fall down and worship the image of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar has set up. ⁶Whoever does not fall down and worship will immediately be thrown into a blazing furnace."

⁷Therefore, as soon as they heard the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp and all kinds of music, all the peoples, nations and men of every language fell down and worshiped the image of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

⁸At this time some astrologers came forward and denounced the Jews. ⁹They said to King Nebuchadnezzar, "O king, live forever! ¹⁰You have issued a decree, O king, that everyone who hears the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music must fall down and worship the image of gold, ¹¹and that whoever does not fall down and worship will be thrown into a blazing furnace.

¹²But there are some Jews whom you have set over the affairs of the province of Babylon—Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego—who pay no attention to you, O king. They neither serve your gods nor worship the image of gold you have set up."

13Furious with rage, Nebuchadnezzar summoned Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. So these men were brought before the king, ¹⁴and Nebuchadnezzar said to them, "Is it true, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, that you do not serve my gods or worship the image of gold I have set up? ¹⁵Now when you hear the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music, if you are ready to fall down and worship the image I made, very good. But if you do not worship it, you will be thrown immediately into a blazing furnace. Then what god will be able to rescue you from my hand?"

¹⁶Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego replied to the king, "O Nebuchadnezzar, we do not need to defend ourselves before you in this matter. ¹⁷If we are thrown into the blazing furnace, the God we serve is able to save us from it, and he will rescue us from your hand, O king. ¹⁸But even if he does not, we want you to know, O king, that we will not serve your gods or worship the image of gold you have set up."

¹⁹Then Nebuchadnezzar was furious with Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, and his attitude toward them changed. He ordered the furnace heated seven times hotter than usual ²⁰and commanded some of the strongest soldiers in his army to tie up Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego and throw them into the blazing furnace. ²¹So these men, wearing their robes, trousers, turbans and other clothes, were bound and thrown into the blazing furnace. ²²The king's command was so urgent and the furnace so hot that the flames of the fire killed the soldiers who took up Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, ²³and these three men, firmly tied, fell into the blazing furnace.

²⁴Then King Nebuchadnezzar leaped to his feet in amazement and asked his advisers, "Weren't there three men that we tied up and threw into the fire?"

They replied, "Certainly, O king."

²⁵He said, "Look! I see four men walking around in the fire, unbound and unharmed, and the fourth looks like a son of the gods."

²⁶Nebuchadnezzar then approached the opening of the blazing furnace and shouted, "Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, servants of the Most High God, come out! Come here!"

So Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego came out of the fire, ²⁷and the satraps, prefects, governors and royal advisers crowded around them. They saw that the fire had not harmed their bodies, nor was a hair of their heads singed; their robes were not scorched, and there was no smell of fire on them.

²⁸Then Nebuchadnezzar said, "Praise be to the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, who has sent his angel and rescued his servants! They trusted in him and defied the king's command and were willing to give up their lives rather than serve or worship any god except their own God. ²⁹Therefore I decree that the people of any nation or language who say anything against the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego be cut into pieces and their houses be turned into piles of rubble, for no other god can save in this way."

³⁰Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the province of Babylon.

Original Meaning

Daniel 3 contains a single story with a clear beginning, middle, and end. In other words, though it fits nicely into the broader context, it has its own plot, which generates tension but moves toward resolution.

As with the first two chapters, Daniel 3 is set during the reign of King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon. This is the first chapter, however, that does not give a more precise chronological marker. We do not know how much time has elapsed since the previous episode, but we must imagine a gap of not a few years to account for Nebuchadnezzar's shift from honoring the God of Daniel as he did at the end of chapter 2 to throwing that God's devotees into a burning furnace.¹

The plot tension is introduced when Nebuchadnezzar made a huge golden statue and then insisted that everyone present bow down and worship it. Later we will explore the possible significance behind this command, but here we simply note that people of the time would by and large have had little difficulty with this request. After all, most people in the ancient Near East were polytheists, used to acknowledging many deities. They could easily assimilate this statue into their religious scheme, especially under the duress of capital punishment. But this was not true of the Judeans in exile. Their belief in one God prohibited participation in this ritual, and their adversaries knew it.

The text indicates that the three friends of Daniel could have gotten away with their nonconformance if it were not for certain enemies who turned them in (vv. 9–12). These informers are identified as "some astrologers" (v. 8) and probably were professional colleagues who hated to see these gifted foreigners rise so quickly and so high in the Babylonian government. They thought they had the perfect plan to do away with them.

Thus, from a literary point of view, this account is a narrative of "court conflict." This label rightly indicates that here the Judeans encounter the animosity of their enemies in a way that they have not yet experienced. This account may be the first record of specifically religious persecution, but unfortunately not the last.³

In chapter 2, God made known his great wisdom. Here, he will reveal his power. The story in this way will again support the overarching theme of the book of Daniel: In spite of present appearances, God is in control. The specific focus of this chapter is that God's power transcends even death. This stirring story intends to bolster the courage of God's people as they face what seems to be overwhelming odds.

The structure of the chapter is as follows: (1) Nebuchadnezzar's image of gold (3:1–7); the accusation against the three friends (3:8–12); the confrontation with Nebuchadnezzar (3:13–18); the miraculous deliverance (3:19–27); Nebuchadnezzar worships God (3:28–30). Catholic editions of Daniel include two additions to this chapter: a short prayer of Azariah, followed by a song sung by the three young men.⁴ The prayer is one of confession and acknowledgment of God's justice, much like Daniel 9 in tone. The song (preceded by a short prose description of the furnace ordeal) is a hymn extolling God.

Nebuchadnezzar's Image of Gold (3:1–7)

THE EPISODE BEGINS with the simple statement that Nebuchadnezzar built a golden image on the plain of Dura.⁵ The author of Daniel does not inform us whether the image was a god or the king himself? In one sense, this distinction does not matter. Whether deity or the divinized king, the command was to worship and bow down to this statue, to treat it or what it represented as the most important power in the universe. Such a command was impossible for a faithful follower of the true God to obey, and that is the point of the text.

All we learn about the statue is its dimensions and the material out of which it was made. Like many ancient idols it was made from a precious metal, in this case gold. Analogies with other idols known from this time period suggest that the statue was gold-plated and not solid gold. The gold of this statue links the story with Nebuchadnezzar's recently described dream in which he was the head of gold. Perhaps this is a clue that the statue was indeed of the king, though rarely did Mesopotamian kings present themselves as gods, and we have no other evidence that Nebuchadnezzar broke this tradition.

The size of the image is startling: "ninety feet high and nine feet wide." Commentators have grappled with what Young has called the "grotesque" shape of this statue, suggesting solutions like a large dais included in the dimensions or pointing to the long, thin (though much smaller) statues of deities and worshipers recovered through archaeology. Collins provides the most exhaustive list of large statues known in the ancient world, most notably mentioning the statue of Bel in Babylon as reported by Herodotus (who calls it Bel Zeus), though this statue was only eighteen feet high. Other scholars mention the colossus of Rhodes, closer in height to Nebuchadnezzar's statue and built in the following Persian period. 10

Nebuchadnezzar not only built the statue; he demanded a public demonstration of adoration. For this purpose, he issued a call for "the satraps, prefects, governors, advisers, treasurers, judges, magistrates and all the other provincial officials" to attend its dedication. With this rather imposing list of officials, we encounter a lengthy list that is repeated a number of times in the chapter. These lists appear ponderous to us, but their literary effect is to heighten the tension and the feeling of danger toward the three friends, who will soon be singled out of the group. As Fewell states it, "through repetition, the narrator creates a scenario in which conformity is normative, disobedience is unthinkable." The various categories of people in the list are political officials from around the empire, which may signal that this was Nebuchadnezzar's attempt to solidify control over the diverse elements of his vast empire.

We encounter a second lengthy list as well, which is also repeated (cf. vv. 5, 7, 10, 15: "the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music"). This is a list of musical instruments at whose sound everyone was to show their respects to the statue. This list emphasizes the "pomp" surrounding the ceremony and heightens the tension, focusing on the moment of obedience or disobedience.

As reported in these first seven verses, everything seems to be proceeding according to the specifications of the king. The order was given through the musical prelude, and "all the peoples, nations and men of every language fell down and worshiped the image of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up" (v. 7). Or so he thought....

The Accusation Against the Three Friends (3:8–12)

INDEED, WHEN VERSE 7 reports that everyone worshiped the image, it is probably giving Nebuchadnezzar's perspective. As his eyes scanned the plain of Dura, he apparently saw only the large crowd obeying his command to prostrate themselves before his golden statue. His contentment was shattered, however, by the report he received from a contingent of astrologers, who accused "some Jews" (v. 12) of disobedience to the king's direct command in spite of the threatened penalty of a horrible death.

We should note that this is an accusation by some astrologers against some Jews. It is not a class action against a whole people. Indeed, many aspects of this story leave us with various questions. What about the other Jewish people? Were any others present? Did they conform? And, most provocatively, where was Daniel?

We should avoid making dogmatic pronouncements when the text is silent. Wood goes over the edge when he asserts, for instance, that the three friends stood completely alone and every other Jewish person gave in.¹³ Critical scholars take the silence of the text too far in a different direction when they use Daniel's absence to speak of a separate tradition that knew of the three friends but not of Daniel, and a later redaction that brought the two strands together in a kind of slipshod manner.¹⁴

Perhaps it is correct to treat Daniel 2:49 ("Moreover, at Daniel's request the king appointed Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego administrators over the province of Babylon, while Daniel himself remained at the royal court") as an implicit answer to the question of Daniel's absence. It certainly explains why Daniel and the three friends were not automatically together, but we cannot, again, be dogmatic.

The text is a bit more suggestive, though once again not explicit, about the motivation of the accusing astrologers. The hint comes when they describe the three Jews as those "whom you have set over the affairs of the province of Babylon" (v. 12). These men appear to be motivated out of professional jealousy. They beat them out for best honors in their school (ch. 1), and now they are rapidly rising in the ranks of the government—and they are foreigners to boot!

Close attention to the words of the astrologers reveal their strategy as they stir the king to action against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. In a phrase, they appeal to his sense of vanity. The disobedience of the three Jews is a personal affront. After all, he was the one who issued the decree and warned of the penalty. These rebels "pay no attention to you, O king. They neither serve your gods nor worship the image of gold you have set up" (v. 12, italics added). With this approach, Nebuchadnezzar's reaction is predictable.

The Confrontation With Nebuchadnezzar (3:13–18)

A CASE COULD be made as early as chapter 2 that Nebuchadnezzar betrays a sense of insecurity. This sounds surprising for the most powerful human being on the face of the earth, but with power and wealth come those who want to take it away for themselves, even if it means murder. Nebuchadnezzar's insecurity is apparent in his treatment of the wisdom teachers in chapter 2 as well as in his happiness after learning that he was the head of gold.

The premise of this chapter is the enforced worship of Nebuchadnezzar's golden statue, which, whether idol or royal statue, is a way of compelling a display of loyalty. The report of disloyalty among the three friends causes an explosion of anger on his part. He immediately has them brought into his presence for a personal loyalty test.

The tension reaches fever pitch when Nebuchadnezzar orders a personal ceremony for the three, instructing the band to strike up the introit, at the end of which they are to worship the image. He climaxes his exhortation with a statement that gets at the heart of the theological teaching of the chapter: "What god will be able to rescue you from my hand" (v. 15). In chapter 2, we saw the astrologers themselves unknowingly throwing down the challenge to the Lord God as they asserted that no god had the requisite wisdom to answer the king's question (2:11). Here the king asserts his own power above all gods, and we can imagine the God of Psalm 2 raising his eyebrows and emitting a slight chuckle.

The three friends are not ready to laugh, but they stand their ground in a rather startling way. Their answer seems arrogant at first hearing: "We do not need to defend ourselves before you in this matter" (v. 16). They go on to explain in a way that strikes us as odd, but when properly understood, becomes an example of tremendous courage in the context of intense religious persecution (vv. 17–18): "If we are thrown into the blazing furnace, the God we serve is able to save us from it, and he will rescue us from your hand, O king. But even if he does not, we want you to know, O king, that we will not serve your gods or worship the image of gold you have set up."

This is no easy answer to the king's anger. They begin by acknowledging God's ability to save them, but then they envision the possibility that God may choose not to do so.¹⁵ In other words, they answer Nebuchadnezzar in light of the possibility that they will be burned to ashes in the blazing furnace. Whichever is the case, they say, they will not worship the golden image.

In its original setting, this answer heightens the literary tension of the story (at least on first hearing). Even the faithful follower of God does not know what will happen to the three friends. Will they live or die? God may rescue them or they may die, martyrs to the cause of faith. But even those original hearers of the story who know the outcome can find great significance in this answer. Yes, the three friends survive, but they also know that some of their people have died at the hands of the persecutors. Was this because God was unable to deliver at those times? Was it because these others did not have the requisite faith? No, it was that God, in his unfathomable wisdom, did not chose to save them. No matter what the result, deliverance or death, they will not give into the evil powers of the world. They will stay faithful to God. This, of course, will have tremendous implications for how we think about suffering today (see below).

The Miraculous Deliverance (3:19–27)

THE THREE FRIENDS' speech, courageous in our ears, exasperates the king. He grows even more furious. Interestingly, the Aramaic text, which the NIV idiomatically translates as "his attitude toward them changed," may more literally be translated, "the image [selem] of his face changed." The one who in his pride has created an image with the purpose of assuring uniform loyalty finds his own image provoked beyond his control. He orders the furnace, apparently burning in the background of the scene, to be superheated, reflecting perhaps the heat of his own anger. Then he orders his soldiers to throw the three Jews in.

Our picture of this furnace is supplied by the description of the text rather than any firm archaeological knowledge. For the narrative to make sense, the furnace must be large. Some scholars have suggested that this is a furnace near the plain of Dura that was used to make the great golden image in the first place. Apparently the three are thrown in from an opening at the top, but Nebuchadnezzar's ability to look into the furnace indicates that perhaps there was a window or opening at the side as well.

In any case, the soldiers obediently cast Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego into the fire. The fire is so hot that it kills the soldiers. Loyalty to a godless and foolish king brings death, not the life one would expect. But what about those who refuse obedience when it comes to a choice between faithfulness to Nebuchadnezzar and to God himself? Is there "a god" who can rescue them from the hands of such a powerful ruler?

Nebuchadnezzar himself gives us the answer: "I see four men walking around in the fire, unbound and unharmed, and the fourth looks like a son of the gods" (v. 25). The king quickly gets the message and orders the three out, and then Nebuchadnezzar and all the others, including the accusers, witness the extent of the miracle of deliverance. Verse 21 narrated the clothing of the three when they were thrown in. They were fully dressed in "robes, trousers, turbans and other clothes," but when they emerged, "the fire had not harmed their bodies, nor was a hair of their heads singed; their robes were not scorched, and there was no smell of fire on them" (v. 27). It was as if they were not even in the fire.

In this way, God is showing Nebuchadnezzar who is in charge. Even if the image that precipitated the crisis is not of Nebuchadnezzar himself, he has certainly put himself in place of God, insisting that he is the ultimate power of the universe, from whose rage no deity could hope to save a follower. By contrast, it is only the true God who can proclaim that "no one can deliver out of my hand" (Deut. 32:39). And this great God was a proven deliverer. After all, when he rescued his people from Egypt centuries before, Moses told the Israelites that it was God who "brought you out of the iron-smelting furnace, out of Egypt, to be the people of his inheritance, as you now are" (4:20).

Nebuchadnezzar Worships God (3:28-30)

THAT GOD RESCUED the three Jews no one is in doubt, but who was that "fourth [who] looks like a son of the gods" (v. 25)? As in chapter 2, Nebuchadnezzar is moved from anger to praise toward God and his followers. In his concluding speech in the present chapter, he again mentions the mysterious fourth person. When he first saw the figure, he labeled him a "son of the gods"; now he calls him God's "angel" (v. 28). His dual description has launched a debate that continues to the present day, which will take us into the next two sections as well as into a consideration whether our later perspective might throw even more light on the issue. But at this stage we must remember that the narrative places these two descriptions in the mouth of Nebuchadnezzar, who is not an Israelite theologian. Relying on his words, we are thrown into a quandary: Was this God himself as "a son of the gods" might lead us to believe, 17 or an angel?

In one sense, it does not make any difference. Even if the fourth figure was an angel, it was God's angel; God is still the redeemer. Even Nebuchadnezzar recognizes this. He further acknowledges that the three have been right to obey this God rather than a king like him.

The king then issues a command that, while not instituting worship of the true God, will not allow anyone in his kingdom to show such a powerful deity any disrespect. Furthermore, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego get a further promotion, thus completely thwarting the intentions of their accusers.

Bridging Contexts

THE PRECIPITATING CAUSE of the action in Daniel 3 is Nebuchadnezzar's construction of a huge statue with the attendant insistence that all the leaders, indeed the "peoples, nations and men of every language" (v. 4), bow down in worship to this statue.

Near Eastern idolatry. As we have noted, it is impossible to be dogmatic concerning the identity of the statue. Is it the king himself or, as is more likely, one of the gods? And, if the latter, which one? There are two reasons to tip the scale slightly in favor of seeing the statue as that of a deity. (1) It was rare for Mesopotamian kings to be divinized, and there is no evidence that Nebuchadnezzar ever moved in this direction.

(2) If the king were divine, why would he need to build a statue-idol to receive worship when he himself was physically present?¹⁸ An idol of a god in Mesopotamian religious conception was a way in which to make the normally invisible god present. The gods were active in the world, often as personified forces of nature, but they were not visible. An idol made a god visible. The idol was not the god, but since it represented the god, it was imbued with the god's aura. A sophisticated Mesopotamian theologian would have denied an equation between the physical idol and his god; but in another sense, the idol, being the physical manifestation of the god, was treated as if it were the god. We know about elaborate ceremonies of bathing and feeding statues that showed the awe with which these physical objects were approached.¹⁹ While the theologian and other sophisticated thinkers in the society approached the idol as a symbol of the god, I suspect that many people were more crass in their identification of god and idol.²⁰

Regardless of whether the idol was royal or divine, the statue was understood to represent a god or even in the minds of some identified with a god. It was a deity represented by a statue constructed from precious materials and intended to represent a deity of some sort. It was therefore the appropriate object of adoration. The three friends knew exactly what the statue stood for, and they also understood that they could not be faithful to the true God and bow the knee to the statue. They also realized that the cost was heavy indeed, namely, their lives.

They understood their God's will concerning their participation in the ritual on the plain of Dura, because God had expressed that will through the Ten Commandments centuries before and had laid the foundation with the first two commandments (Ex. 20:3–6):

You shall have no other gods before me.

You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments.

By not worshiping this deity, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego became role models for God's people when faced with the seduction or the threat of the worship of deities constructed by human minds and human hands.

This occasion, of course, was not the first time where Israel felt the seduction of idol worship. Indeed, God's people during the Old Testament period lived constantly in the dangerous world of idols. Their danger was in their seductive power. All the nations around Israel worshiped them, nations more powerful and successful (in a worldly sense) than they were. Indeed, these are the nations that overpowered them. The temptation would be strong to worship the gods of their oppressors for one's own advancement and because of the apparent superiority of their culture and their military power. Daniel 3 itself illustrates how, at least in this case, the worship of idols would advance one's career, while refusing to worship this idol could result in death. Many Jewish exiles may have been tempted to worship idols because they would understand Babylon's political superiority as a reflex of the superior power of their gods.

As we read the story of Israel in the Old Testament, we observe that the people and the leaders did not always successfully resist the temptation to worship those shiny, impressive-looking statues. It is for this reason that the prophets inveigh so heavily against them. Indeed, Isaiah is at his sarcastic and rhetorical best when he ridicules the idols of the surrounding nations. He satirizes idol worship by reducing it to a fetish (Isa. 44:12–20):²¹

The blacksmith takes a tool and works with it in the coals: he shapes an idol with hammers, he forges it with the might of his arm. He gets hungry and loses his strength; he drinks no water and grows faint. The carpenter measures with a line and makes an outline with a marker; he roughs it out with chisels and marks it with compasses. He shapes it in the form of man, of man in all his glory, that it may dwell in a shrine. He cut down cedars, or perhaps took a cypress or oak. He let it grow among the trees of the forest, or planted a pine, and the rain made it grow. It is man's fuel for burning; some of it he takes and warms himself. he kindles a fire and bakes bread. But he also fashions a god and worships it; he makes an idol and bows down to it. Half of the wood he burns in the fire: over it he prepares his meal, he roasts his meat and eats his fill. He also warms himself and says, "Ah! I am warm; I see the fire." From the rest he makes a god, his idol; he bows down to it and worships. He prays to it and says, "Save me; you are my god." They know nothing, they understand nothing; their eyes are plastered over so they cannot see, and their minds closed so they cannot understand. No one stops to think, no one has the knowledge or understanding to say, "Half of it I used for fuel: I even baked bread over its coals. I roasted meat and I ate. Shall I make a detestable thing from what is left? Shall I bow down to a block of wood?" He feeds on ashes, a deluded heart misleads him: he cannot save himself, or say, "Is not this thing in my right hand a lie?"

Isaiah shows in most graphic and even darkly humorous terms that the worship of an idol (in the case of Dan. 3, the statue in the plain of Dura) was a confusion of the creation with the Creator. In idol worship, a person takes a bit of created matter and says, "You are the most important thing to me in the world. You have all the power and the wisdom!"

Now, it is true that a sophisticated ancient Near Eastern theologian (as opposed to the general populace) would likely have responded to Isaiah, "Don't be ridiculous. We don't worship that wood and metal statue! That object is simply a representation of the deity, who is not restricted to the statue but is a power above human power." But even so, what do the gods of the ancient Near East themselves represent? Who are Marduk and Ishtar, or Baal and Astarte? They are personifications of bits of creation as well. Marduk, the leading god of the neo-Babylonian empire of Nebuchadnezzar, and Baal, his counterpart in Canaan, were the power of fertility, the storm, the dew. Ishtar, also from Mesopotamia, and Astarte, her counterpart in Canaan, personified sexual potency and the violence of war.

In other words, not only the statues but the deities that they represented are bits of creation raised to the level of the Creator. We can hear Paul's later words ringing in our ears (Rom. 1:21–22):

For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles.

We can see the seriousness of the challenge to the faith of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. They are being told to demote their God, the one who created them, by not giving him their exclusive worship. They are also to worship a statue of a god they know does not exist. They cannot simply rationalize their actions, because the act of bowing down and worship indicates that they affirm the statue as equal to their God. By accepting this statue into the category of deity, they will inevitably reduce the ultimacy, authority, and jurisdiction of the true God and demote him in such a way that will make him out to be no more than one of the deities of the polytheistic world. Ultimately, the dilution or diminishment of deity is a denunciation of deity.²²

As Christians in the West at the end of the twentieth century, we are not confronted with the same threat as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego—or are we? Certainly no one would build a statue and insist that we all bow down before it. But the threat of idolatry is much more subtle and therefore threatening to us today. To understand this, I find a concept of Paul Tillich, a German-American theologian of the mid-twentieth century, helpful, namely, that of "Ultimate Concern." Tillich pointed out that a person's god is the thing or person that one is most concerned about, thinks the most about, or affects one's life the most.

If Tillich's language is a tad abstract for some, let me introduce a phrase made famous by Bill Bright and Campus Crusade. He used a catchy metaphor to get people to think about what is acting as a god in their lives by inquiring, "Who is on the throne of your life?" If it is not the true God of the Bible, he suggests, then it is an idol. In the Contemporary Significance section we will explore what permutations idolatry takes in our time.

Faithful in the face of death. But harking back to our comments on Daniel 3, we want to observe how the three friends react to Nebuchadnezzar's insistence that they worship the idol. In many ways, the problem is similar to the one encountered in chapter 1 How are God's faithful people to act in a faithless world?

In our present chapter, the dangers are heightened at least on the surface. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego are compelled to conform to Nebuchadnezzar's aberrant religious ceremony in a public setting under the threat of death. We are first struck again by the lack of stridency exhibited by the faithful Jewish youths. Unlike the young third-century A.D. theologian Origen, who wanted to throw himself in front of the emperor's chariot and proclaim Christ, they simply quietly decide not to participate. Apparently, the king does not even notice them; it takes a group of informants who are out to get the three to bring it to the king's attention. But when they are then brought in for private interrogation, they show that their quiet rebellion earlier does not hide a heart of cowardice. They calmly and boldly proclaim their faith without a moment's hesitation.

Their courage is remarkable. They do not seek death, but neither do they shirk it. They refuse to betray their God even in the light of the real possibility that they may die for their stand.

Indeed, we must be very careful not to let the optimistic outcome of the story cloud our vision. The friends have no confidence that they will survive the ordeal ("even if he does not [save us], we want you to know, O king, that we will not serve your gods or worship the image of gold you have set up" [v. 18]). They know that that type of confidence is nothing but the most irksome of presumptions.

Their response preserves the story from devolving into a false promise that God will save every faithful person from suffering and death. Such a story would betray the faithful martyrs who have stood faithful but suffered death. Jesus himself honored God's followers who died during the Old Testament time when he spoke of "all the righteous blood that has been shed on the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah son of Berekiah" (Matt. 23:35). The story of church history from its beginnings under the Roman empire to the present has countless stories of faithful witnesses who have stood firm to the end.

The three friends' courage is all the more amazing when we reflect on what they may have thought concerning life after death. In a word, it is not at all clear that they had a definite idea of a judgment or reward after death, and it is extremely unlikely that, even if they did know of the resurrection of the dead, that they had an extensive picture of the blessings of heaven. They certainly do not appeal to such a hope here, and there is little explicit teaching about the resurrection of the dead, eternal life, or heaven in previous Scripture. The teaching is there implicitly, and later in the book of Daniel it becomes explicit (Dan. 12:1–3), but something other than future bliss motivates the three friends and invests their potential death with meaning.

Towner at least partially captures their motivation when he states that "their deaths subverted the power of the authorities to crush integrity and to silence truth."²⁴ In this regard, he compares the meaningfulness of the martyr's death to the meaninglessness of the death of the guards, who obediently escorted the three friends to the mouth of the fiery furnace.

But a more specific answer to the question is forthcoming when we consider the actual contents of the three friends' "truth" and "integrity." They stand firm because they trust their God—no matter what, and no matter what includes death. Victor Frankl, a survivor of German death camps and no stranger to courage in the face of the danger of death himself, quotes Nietzsche's aphorism that applies to the three friends as well as to himself, "He who has a why to live can bear with almost any how." But the three friends take it far beyond Nietzsche. That philosopher is well known for his statement, "That which does not kill me, makes me stronger." The three friends bear witness to the fact that even death does not defeat them.

Contemporary Significance

MODERN IDOLATRY. AT first it is difficult for us as Christians living at the turn of the millennium to identify with the challenge facing the Jewish people on the plain of Dura. But we have suggested that the issue transcends the worship of a particular statue and concerns instead the constant threat to dilute the worship of the true God by elevating anything or anyone else to a comparable place of importance in our life. As John Calvin has provocatively charged, the human mind is a "factory of idols." We are constantly, even as Christians, in a struggle with this temptation.

The temptation can come from a variety of sources, not all of which seem so bad on the surface of it. Our addictions can make pleasure an idol, so that all our efforts and thoughts are directed toward where we will get our next high, whether through alcohol, drugs, sex, or some other cheap thrill. We might seek power in order to control our world or simply to have the resources of revenge toward those who have hurt us in some way. All our efforts and strength thus become directed toward amassing power and influence in society, our family, or even the church. We may make relationships, or one particular relationship, an idol. We may be gearing our life and decisions not around what we understand to be God's will, but rather the will of a spouse, a child, or a friend. Seeking knowledge or degrees, writing books, or delivering impressive sermons, these too may become idols.

The list is vast, which is why the danger is so real. The seduction is subtle, which is why we can slip so easily into idol worship.²⁶ But though subtle and varied, I suggest that idolatry, whether of Nebuchadnezzar's sort or the kind we discover in our own hearts, ultimately has one object. When the masks are ripped away, behind every idol is the self. Frederick Nietzsche, the late nineteenth-century philosopher whose thought has such a huge influence on contemporary postmodern culture, saw this, and in his brutal and honest atheism, advocated the killing of God and the construction of a new idol, the human self. Hear him as he preaches his new doctrine:

Whatever in me has feeling, suffers and is in prison; but my will always comes to me as my liberator and joy-bringer. Willing liberates: that is the true teaching of will and liberty—thus Zarathustra teaches it. Willing no more and esteeming no more and creating no more —oh, that this great weariness might always remain far from me! In knowledge too I feel only my will's joy in begetting and becoming; and if there is innocence in my knowledge, it is because the will to beget is in it. Away from God and gods this will has lured me; what could one create if gods existed?

But my fervent will to create impels me ever again toward man; thus is the hammer impelled toward the stone. O men, in the stone there sleeps an image, the image of my images. Alas, that it must sleep in the hardest, the ugliest stone! Now my hammer rages cruelly against its prison. Pieces of rock rain from the stone: what is that to me? I want to perfect it; for a shadow came to me—the stillest and lightest of all things once came to me. The beauty of the overman came to me as a shadow. O my brothers, what are the gods to me now?

Thus spoke Zarathustra.²⁷

God is dead; the self must replace it. In a sense, this might seem to be the opposite of Daniel 3, but it is not. It is not so much a ridding the world of God, but a replacing of God by another god—the self. Nietzsche attempted to kill God because he could not tolerate any but himself in that position: "But let me reveal my heart to you entirely, my friends: if there were gods, how could I endure not to be a god! Hence there are no gods."²⁸

Here is the heart of modern postmodern society: In the absence of the gods we may and must create our own meaning. No longer does Christ provide meaning. No longer do we feel the existential nausea of no meaning. Now we feel the will to power and the joy in constructing our own meaning in the absence of the gods. All substitutes for God are ultimately this idol—the idol of self. And as the end of the twentieth century is in the process of discovering, this idol does not lead to life, but to death—cultural and individual.

As Christians, we may not bow to this idol in any of its manifestations. Our only worship is to be directed to the one and only true and full image of God, Jesus Christ, the one whom Paul called "the image of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15).²⁹ Ultimately, then, the second commandment, which was the heart of the three friends' resistance to the idolatry of Nebuchadnezzar, when read in the context of the canon as a whole, draws us to Jesus Christ, Word of God and Image of God. It is to this image alone that our worship is properly directed.

Resistance to the point of death. Daniel 3 teaches us that we must not only resist idolatry, but we must be prepared to resist it to the point of death. American Christians, in spite of all their complaints about the infringements on their religion, are rarely, if ever, confronted with that kind of decision. This is not true of Christians in many other parts of the twentieth-century world, where their faith and witness can lead to a prison term or a death penalty. Such Christian witness indicates to us that the courage of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego lives on.

But, of course, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego are not the only biblical role models for faithful resistance to powerful and oppressive human governments. We can think of Acts 24–26, when Paul bore witness before Felix and Agrippa, or 5:29, when Peter proclaimed before the high priest, "We must obey God rather than men!" They knew the force of Jesus' warning, "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather, be afraid of the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).³⁰

Where does the Christian, starting with Peter and the apostles until today, find the moral and religious strength to make such a courageous stand? From Jesus Christ. Jesus himself was put on trial for his religious claim that he was the Messiah. Facing death himself, he refused to capitulate, dying on the cross (cf. Matt. 27:11–14).

But was Jesus at the heart of the hope of the three friends as they faced death in the furnace? It is difficult to say how specifically their hope focused on the coming Savior, the Messiah. They trusted in the saving power of God, but it is provocative to reflect on the way God chose to deliver the three from the fire. Calvin pointed out that if God wanted, he could have extinguished the flames of the fire in order to save the three men. He saved them in the fire, not from the fire.³¹ They were in the very jaws of death. Moreover, he could have saved them without further fanfare, simply having them walk out of the fire unscathed, but instead he chose to save them by the presence of a "fourth [who] looks like a son of the gods" (v. 25).

Was this "fourth" being Jesus, as many interpreters from the earliest Christian times have suggested? It is impossible to be dogmatic unless one insists that every incarnate appearance of God must be the second person of the Trinity. It is safer to say that what we have here is a reflection of Immanuel, "God with us." God dwelt with the three friends in the midst of the flames to preserve them from harm. In this sense, the Christian cannot help but see a prefigurement of Jesus Christ, who came to earth to dwell in a chaotic world and who even experienced death, not so that we might escape the experience of death but that we might have victory over it.

While this discussion might be an appropriate place to reflect further on the Christian hope of resurrection, we will reserve our comments until Daniel 12, which takes us even further in the book's theology of death.

Daniel 4:1-37

¹KING NEBUCHADNEZZAR, To the peoples, nations and men of every language, who live in all the world:

May you prosper greatly!

²It is my pleasure to tell you about the miraculous signs and wonders that the Most High God has performed for me.

 ³How great are his signs, how mighty his wonders!
 His kingdom is an eternal kingdom; his dominion endures from generation to generation.

⁴I, Nebuchadnezzar, was at home in my palace, contented and prosperous. ⁵I had a dream that made me afraid. As I was lying in my bed, the images and visions that passed through my mind terrified me. ⁶So I commanded that all the wise men of Babylon be brought before me to interpret the dream for me. ⁷When the magicians, enchanters, astrologers and diviners came, I told them the dream, but they could not interpret it for me. ⁸Finally, Daniel came into my presence and I told him the dream. (He is called Belteshazzar, after the name of my god, and the spirit of the holy gods is in him.)

⁹I said, "Belteshazzar, chief of the magicians, I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in you, and no mystery is too difficult for you. Here is my dream; interpret it for me. ¹⁰These are the visions I saw while lying in my bed: I looked, and there before me stood a tree in the middle of the land. Its height was enormous. ¹¹The tree grew large and strong and its top touched the sky; it was visible to the ends of the earth. ¹²Its leaves were beautiful, its fruit abundant, and on it was food for all. Under it the beasts of the field found shelter, and the birds of the air lived in its branches; from it every creature was fed.

¹³"In the visions I saw while lying in my bed, I looked, and there before me was a messenger, a holy one, coming down from heaven. ¹⁴He called in a loud voice: 'Cut down the tree and trim off its branches; strip off its leaves and scatter its fruit. Let the animals flee from under it and the birds from its branches. ¹⁵But let the stump and its roots, bound with iron and bronze, remain in the ground, in the grass of the field.

"Let him be drenched with the dew of heaven, and let him live with the animals among the plants of the earth. ¹⁶Let his mind be changed from that of a man and let him be given the mind of an animal, till seven times pass by for him.

17"The decision is announced by messengers, the holy ones declare the verdict, so that the living may know that the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes and sets over them the lowliest of men.'

¹⁸"This is the dream that I, King Nebuchadnezzar, had. Now, Belteshazzar, tell me what it means, for none of the wise men in my kingdom can interpret it for me. But you can, because the spirit of the holy gods is in you."

¹⁹Then Daniel (also called Belteshazzar) was greatly perplexed for a time, and his thoughts terrified him. So the king said, "Belteshazzar, do not let the dream or its meaning alarm you."

Belteshazzar answered, "My lord, if only the dream applied to your enemies and its meaning to your adversaries! ²⁰The tree you saw, which grew large and strong, with its top touching the sky, visible to the whole earth, ²¹with beautiful leaves and abundant fruit, providing food for all, giving shelter to the beasts of the field, and having nesting places in its branches for the birds of the air—²²you, O king, are that tree! You have become great and strong; your greatness has grown until it reaches the sky, and your dominion extends to distant parts of the earth.

²³"You, O king, saw a messenger, a holy one, coming down from heaven and saying, 'Cut down the tree and destroy it, but leave the stump, bound with iron and bronze, in the grass of the field, while its roots remain in the ground. Let him be drenched with the dew of heaven; let him live like the wild animals, until seven times pass by for him.'

²⁴"This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree the Most High has issued against my lord the king: ²⁵You will be driven away from people and will live with the wild animals; you will eat grass like cattle and be drenched with the dew of heaven. Seven times will pass by for you until you acknowledge that the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes. ²⁶The command to leave the stump of the tree with its roots means that your kingdom will be restored to you when you acknowledge that Heaven rules. ²⁷Therefore, O king, be pleased to accept my advice: Renounce your sins by doing what is right, and your wickedness by being kind to the oppressed. It may be that then your prosperity will continue."

²⁸All this happened to King Nebuchadnezzar.
²⁹Twelve months later, as the king was walking on the roof of the royal palace of Babylon, ³⁰he said, "Is not this the great Babylon I have built as the royal residence, by my mighty power and for the glory of my majesty?"

³¹The words were still on his lips when a voice came from heaven, "This is what is decreed for you, King Nebuchadnezzar: Your royal authority has been taken from you. ³²You will be driven away from people and will live with the wild animals; you will eat grass like cattle. Seven times will pass by for you until you acknowledge that the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes."

³³Immediately what had been said about Nebuchadnezzar was fulfilled. He was driven away from people and ate grass like cattle. His body was drenched with the dew of heaven until his hair grew like the feathers of an eagle and his nails like the claws of a bird.

³⁴At the end of that time, I, Nebuchadnezzar, raised my eyes toward heaven, and my sanity was restored. Then I praised the Most High; I honored and glorified him who lives forever.

His dominion is an eternal dominion; his kingdom endures from generation to generation.

35All the peoples of the earth are regarded as nothing.

He does as he pleases with the powers of heaven and the peoples of the earth.

No one can hold back his hand or say to him: "What have you done?"

³⁶At the same time that my sanity was restored, my honor and splendor were returned to me for the glory of my kingdom. My advisers and nobles sought me out, and I was restored to my throne and became even greater than before. ³⁷Now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and exalt and glorify the King of heaven, because everything he does is right and all his ways are just. And those who walk in pride he is able to humble.

Original Meaning

As IN CHAPTER 2, a dream forms the center of the action in chapter 4. King Nebuchadnezzar is again the recipient of a dream he cannot interpret, and, for a second time, he calls on the services of Daniel. However, in the present account Nebuchadnezzar makes no threats, but summons Daniel immediately after the failure of his (apparently) native corps of wise men. Daniel again succeeds where the Babylonian diviners fail, proving indeed that the "spirit of the holy gods" (v. 18) lives in him. However, this story does not focus or emphasize Daniel's divinely given skills as much as deals with the issue of overwhelming human pride.

As we will see in our survey of the chapter's contents, the dream properly warns Nebuchadnezzar of the dangers of his pride. This danger is extreme for Nebuchadnezzar, of course, because he is, after all, the king of Babylon, the most powerful political entity in the known world. He controls the life and death of countless human beings. He enjoys great wealth, prestige, and power. The dream and its consequences are a reminder that whatever he enjoys is at the pleasure of the true God, who, as the chapter is at pains to demonstrate, "is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes" (v. 25). Through the dream and its interpretation, he calls on Nebuchadnezzar to remember his subservience to a higher power, and through Nebuchadnezzar, the chapter reminds other powerful men and women of the same important truth. "Pride goes before destruction, a haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov. 16:18).

The chapter has a unique literary structure, indeed so unique that it has resulted in a discrepancy in the tradition of dividing the book into chapters. The English division is in keeping with the contours of the story and begins in verse 1 of chapter 4 in the English, however, is 3:31 in the Aramaic.³ Apparently it was thought more typical to end rather than begin a story with a doxology.⁴

We should also mention the discussion about the role of Nebuchadnezzar in this chapter. In brief, the issue surrounds the fact that the story reports a period of seven years where he was unfit for royal duties, an event not mentioned in the extrabiblical texts. It is probably unwise to make much out of the silence of the extrabiblical texts, since the king's reign is not exhaustively documented and it is not the type of thing that Nebuchadnezzar may have wanted preserved for perpetuity in his royal inscriptions.

Nonetheless, attention has been drawn to a text discovered at Qumran called the Prayer of Nabonidus (4QPrNab), which some scholars have felt is the solution to the historical-literary conundrum.⁵ The Prayer of Nabonidus is the story of an affliction of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon and the father of Belshazzar (see Dan. 5 for more on them). In this fragmentary text Nabonidus was said to fall ill for seven years, at the end of which he was cured through the intervention of an unnamed Jewish diviner. Another extrabiblical text has also sometimes been claimed to be a "source" for Daniel 4—a text now preserved only in the writings of the church historian Eusebius.⁶ It is a speech that Nebuchadnezzar gives on the roof of his palace, where he prophesies the coming of the one who will destroy Babylon (a pejorative reference to Cyrus) and wishes that that person might rather become like a beast in the field.

The surface similarities of the text, however, are overwhelmed by the differences, and in both cases it seems more reasonable to believe, if we follow a sixth-century B.C. dating of Daniel, that they were written not before but in the light of the story of Daniel 4.

This chapter has the form of a letter or written decree of Nebuchadnezzar himself. It is written predominantly in the first person, though verses 19–33 revert to the third person. The story is a tale of court contest in a subdued way, since it quietly shows Daniel succeeding where the Babylonian diviners fail. The structure is as follows—and we should especially note that Nebuchadnezzar's praise brackets the story, coming at the beginning and end of the account: (1) Nebuchadnezzar's decree to praise the Lord (4:1–3); (2) the dream report and the search for an interpreter (4:4–18); (3) the dream interpretation (4:19–27); (4) the fulfillment of the dream (4:28–33); (5) healing and concluding doxology (4:34–37).

Nebuchadnezzar's Decree to Praise the Lord (4:1–3)

THE LAST TWO chapters concluded with Nebuchadnezzar's praise of the Lord, but Daniel 4 departs from the pattern and begins (as well as ends) with Nebuchadnezzar's praise. One of the effects of this structure is to remove suspense concerning the nature of the outcome, but it does raise the reader's interest in discovering what leads to Nebuchadnezzar's joyful outburst. Another effect of the preface to the story, as Dana Fewell points out, is that "as an official proclamation, the piece has an air of reality, an atmosphere of authority."

The outburst is more than spontaneous; it has the form of an official proclamation directed throughout the world. As a matter of fact, Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom stretched from what is today Egypt to western Iran and from modern Syria into Saudi Arabia, encompassing many different cultures and language groups.

The content of his praise is somewhat general, but it highlights God's sovereignty and the wonderful nature of his interaction with the world. The following story is the specification of the events behind the general praise.⁸

The Dream Report and the Search for an Interpreter (4:4–18)

NEBUCHADNEZZAR NOW BEARS witness to the great and supernatural experience that he underwent. He speaks in the first person, employing a form similar to neo-Babylonian royal inscriptions. He begins by stating his prosperity and contentment. The chapter is not dated, but apparently comes at a time when the Babylonian kingdom experiences stability and success.

A dream, however, intrudes into the king's peaceful mind, tormenting him with doubt and fear. His first impulse is to call his professional wise men into his presence. Unlike his earlier dream he tells them the present dream's content, but they are still unable to offer a suitable interpretation. Their failure is a bit mystifying because Daniel's later interpretation is not all that surprising. Nonetheless, the wise men's failure causes the king to call Daniel.

On a psychological level, the modern reader might ask why he waited to call Daniel, considering his earlier success. The text does not give us the king's motives, but the delay does differentiate Daniel from those who used traditional dream interpretation techniques and emphasizes his superiority, who is wise only because of the gift Yahweh has given him.

That Nebuchadnezzar still really hasn't "gotten it" is indicated by the parenthetical comment at the end of verse 8. He refers to Daniel by his Babylonian name, which connects him to the king's native god. Moreover, he speaks of Daniel as the one in whom the "spirit of the holy gods" dwells. Being a polytheist, Nebuchadnezzar has the intellectual framework to subsume Yahweh into his already existing theology.

The king then relates the contents of his dream. Its main feature is a huge tree in the middle of the land. This tree provides shade for all the animals, and its branches are the home of all the birds. The tree is the cosmic tree. It is planted in the "middle of the land," thus a kind of axis mundi. It is a symbol of fertility, growth, and prosperity. It is not only a symbol of life, but also a life-giver, providing sustenance and protection to the animals.

This use of the tree as an image of the life-giving nature of the king has previously been used in biblical tradition (cf. Ezek. 17:1–10; 31:3–14, both also in judgment contexts). The story also connects with the ancient Near East. There is little about a "sacred" or "cosmic" tree in the literature of Mesopotamia, but the tree occurs as a major motif in the iconography. As Parpola has pointed out, "the Tree represents the divine world order maintained by the king as the representative of the god Assur, embodied in the winged disk hovering above the tree." He alerts us to the fact that sometimes the king takes the place of the tree in the iconography; "in such scenes the king is portrayed as the human personification of the Tree. Thus if the Tree symbolized the divine world order, then the king himself represented the realization of that order in man, in other words, a true image of God, the Perfect Man." The implications for Daniel 4 are clear: Nebuchadnezzar's dream shows that he identifies himself with the cosmic tree; he is the keeper of the cosmos, the true image of God, the Perfect Man.

After the description of the tree, the king narrates the plot. It begins with the appearance of a "messenger" (an Aramaic word better translated "watchman" or "watcher," cf. NIV footnote). No doubt a supernatural being is meant (cf. the word's apposition with "holy one"), which reminds us of the frequent use of the word "watchers" for angels in intertestamental literature.¹²

The watcher barks orders for the dismantling of the cosmic tree. All that is to be left is the stump, and around the stump a bronze band is to be placed. The stump indicates that even though the tree is to be desolated, it is not to be killed. The roots are not touched. The band of iron and bronze that is placed around the stump is a mystery to interpreters. Perhaps it emphasizes the fact that the tree is not to be killed, since the band protects what is left. This interpretive approach would be strengthened if such a practice were known from the ancient Near East, but no such evidence is available. Others argue that the mention of the band is the first move from tree imagery to beast imagery. Indeed, the metaphors of the dream are a mixed lot, moving from tree to beast; the tree becomes a beast wandering the earth for "seven times," usually understood to be years.¹³

The dream ends with the watcher's proclamation concerning the motive behind this desolation. It is clearly expressed in verse 17: "that the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes and sets over them the lowliest of men."

With his account of the dream concluded, Nebuchadnezzar turns with confidence to Daniel in order to hear its interpretation.

The Dream Interpretation (4:19–27)

THE CHAPTER UP to this point has been a first-person testimony of the king. The narrative has the ring of a royal inscription, but now the first-person address is displaced by a third-person narrator, who describes the interpretation and the fulfillment of the dream.

Daniel hesitates to give the interpretation. He knows what it means, but its message is so horrifying that he takes no pleasure in relating it to Nebuchadnezzar. The dynamic between Daniel and the king is a remarkable one, considering that this is the king who destroyed Jerusalem, but God's prophet shows concern for the well-being of the king, not vindictiveness.

After receiving encouragement from the king, Daniel reveals the referent of the tree symbol. It is Nebuchadnezzar himself, whose person is the center of the Babylonian world empire, which provides protection and sustenance to the people who inhabit that empire's vast boundaries. Since Nebuchadnezzar is the tree, he is also the subject of the coming judgment. As the tree will be desolated, so he will be desolated. As the subject of the dream will be reduced to an animal-like state, so Nebuchadnezzar will be reduced from his humanity and become beast-like.

This is the message of judgment that confronts Nebuchadnezzar, but it is a conditional message. Daniel's advice is to avoid sin and be kind. In other words, he should not fall prey to the temptation to think himself a god. In spite of his greatness, he must retain his humility.

The Fulfillment of the Dream (4:28–33)

THE NARRATIVE DOES not let Daniel's hope live long. Verse 28 reports in a summarizing fashion, "All this happened to King Nebuchadnezzar." The next few verses report the details of the tragedy.

While the narrative gives an immediate report of Nebuchadnezzar's fall, we learn from verse 29 that a period of twelve months passed before the crucial moment. We are perhaps to understand that the dream and its interpretation frightened Nebuchadnezzar into a temporary compliance. Or perhaps he pretty much continued his sinful (v. 27) course, but God waited until this moment of monumental pride to exercise his judgment. We cannot be sure.

In any case, a year after the dream experience, Nebuchadnezzar was taking a walk on the roof of his palace in Babylon. It is not unusual that he was on the roof of his house, since roofs were flat in the ancient Near East and therefore provided living space. From this obviously high point, he got a good view of the city, and he marveled at its grandeur. As we learn from ancient texts and the results of archaeology, the Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar was grand indeed. According to Michael Roaf,

Babylon contained two of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World, the Hanging Gardens and the city walls. The location of the Hanging Gardens is in doubt but the walls have been traced. The outer wall stretched for more than 8 kilometers and, according to Herodotus, had enough space on top to enable a four-horse chariot to turn around.¹⁴

Nebuchadnezzar had much to do with the greatness of Babylon. From biblical and ancient Near Eastern records contemporary with his reign, we know he had great wealth and was an accomplished builder. He gave the orders and paid the bills. However, his power and accomplishments led to a pride that blinded him from broader realities. He lost sight of the fact that he could only do these things as God gave him the power and ability. His pride led him to make unthinkable claims, especially in the light of the vivid warning he received a year before: "Is not this the great Babylon I have built as the royal residence, by my mighty power and for the glory of my majesty?" (v. 30, italics added).

While God gave him time after his first warning, no time elapses ("the words were still on his lips," v. 31) before a heavenly voice decrees his doom. From being the most powerful man in the world, he is reduced to roaming the steppe like an animal. As Calvin points out, this description does not mean that he thought himself an animal. His insanity¹6 drives him to the open spaces, where he acts like an animal, and his neglect of hygiene leads to an animal-like appearance. The appropriateness of the affliction is noted by Fewell, who states: "A man who thinks he is like a god must become a beast to learn that he is only a human being."

Healing and Concluding Doxology (4:34–37)

WE GET LITTLE insight into Nebuchadnezzar's mental processes. But we are told that the divine prescription works. At the appointed time (the end of the "seven times," cf. v. 25) Nebuchadnezzar "raised [his] eyes toward heaven, and [his] sanity was restored" (v. 34). The action of looking toward heaven is obviously meant as an acknowledgment of God's ultimate superiority. Nebuchadnezzar now understands his place in the scheme of things. He may indeed be powerful relative to the rest of humanity, but he is far from the most powerful being in the universe. Even more important, he understands, at least momentarily, that whatever power he does enjoy is as a gift from God. If it is foolish to say to a human king "What are you doing?" (Eccl. 8:4), how much more foolish is it for a human king to say to the divine king, "What have you done?" (Dan. 4:35). He is the "King of heaven" (v. 37).

Thus, Nebuchadnezzar is restored to sanity and to his relative grandeur as great king of Babylon. The lesson is learned and the moral of the story is the last word: "Those who walk in pride he is able to humble" (v. 37).

Bridging Contexts

Who is in control? As we turn our attention to the relevance of Daniel 4 today, we are tempted to pick up quickly on verse 37b. That God humbles the proud is a message as clearly relevant to today as it was at the time of Nebuchadnezzar. However, to move directly to this important moral lesson bypasses the overarching concern of the chapter, which is that God protects his faithful people in spite of the odds. The purpose of the story is to encourage their confidence in the light of their helplessness before a seemingly all-powerful human ruler.

After all, while most people are not bound in chains and forced into slave labor, Nebuchadnezzar controls their fate, at least seemingly. This account of his dream and madness rips away the facade and shows the reality of who is in control—not Nebuchadnezzar, but God, who calls the shots. Again, fitting in with a major theme of the book, this chapter teaches that God is sovereign (see Introduction). He uses Nebuchadnezzar as he uses all human powers, even those hostile to his name, for his own purposes. Nebuchadnezzar is Yahweh's tool. The king wins victories only when God gives them to him (Dan. 1:1–2); he understands his dreams only when God reveals their meaning through Daniel, his servant (chs. 2 and 4). Nebuchadnezzar cannot harm a hair on the head of one of God's people (ch. 3). The book of Daniel reveals that the Babylonian king is powerless in his own right.

Nebuchadnezzar himself has a hard time seeing it this way. After all, he leads the army, and his treasuries pay for the tremendous building efforts that take place during his reign. As he looks at other men and women around him, he obviously is the most powerful. Not only can he make and break other individuals, but whole nations bow before him. He sits on his throne and people cower because they know he has the power of life and death over them.

The book of Daniel, however, does not portray Nebuchadnezzar as an unsympathetic figure. Daniel appears to care about him and seems honestly chagrined when a difficult fate is decreed for him. As readers, we feel the same ambivalence. The doxological introduction to this chapter in particular makes us feel that Nebuchadnezzar is on our side again, and throughout the chapter there is no harmful move against God's people. Indeed, after another failure of his native band of dream interpreters to come through for him, he quickly sends for Daniel, whom he compliments from his pagan perspective as having the "spirit of the holy gods" in him.

However, even if we, along with Daniel, want Nebuchadnezzar to avoid his terrifying fate, the text does not allow our hopes to blossom. Although chronologically there is a gap of twelve months between the warning (v. 27) and the fulfillment of its threat, narratively there is no time, for the very next verse (v. 28) quickly tells us "all this happened to King Nebuchadnezzar."

The danger of pride. When we turn to the warning and its consequences, the account becomes a story of the danger of pride. Pride, in the negative sense, is a conception of one's self-worth that exceeds the bounds of propriety. In the Bible, as we will see in the next section, those bounds are clearly associated with seeing our every achievement, status, and possession as gifts from God.

In our present story, Nebuchadnezzar's vision of his accomplishments focuses solely on himself. As he looks out on the great city of Babylon, he sees the work of his own hands alone. Thus, God gives him a traumatic lesson to teach him the source of all his abilities and capacities by removing even his reason. Let Nebuchadnezzar glory in himself now as he roams the wilderness with the other animals, ripping grass from the ground with his teeth.

His reason, his exalted position, his wealth, and his power are ultimately returned to him, but only after he acknowledges God's ultimate sovereignty. His restoration begins with the simple gesture of looking to heaven—a cry for help and the recognition of a superior power. It culminates in the praises delivered at the beginning and end of the chapter. God took this prideful, self-centered man and humbled him. Once he acknowledged that "all the peoples of the earth [including himself] are regarded as nothing" (v. 35), God makes him something again.

Is this a lesson for all of us? Again we are faced with the question of the relevance for us of a historical account that could have a unique, time-bound significance. After all, we are speaking of someone who played a special role in the history of God's redemption. In one sense, none of us is like Nebuchadnezzar. But we have already seen that the historical narratives, particularly those in the first part of Daniel, have a broader purpose than simply historical remembrance. Earlier we quoted 1 Corinthians 10:6 to that effect; here let me cite Romans 15:4: "For everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that through endurance and the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope."

Nonetheless, we must also reckon with another source of discontinuity. Nebuchadnezzar was no ordinary human in another sense; he was king of the most powerful political entity in the world. In a sense, his power far exceeded that of any individual living today. The president of the United States has been called the most powerful individual alive, but unlike Nebuchadnezzar he is a temporary and elected official with restricted powers. On a human level, Nebuchadnezzar had none of those restrictions.

But even though Nebuchadnezzar may be an extreme example, pride potentially resides in all human beings. But does all pride get the same dramatic treatment as Nebuchadnezzar, or was the psalmist right when he said in Psalm 73:3–12:

I envied the arrogant when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.
They have no struggles;
their bodies are healthy and strong.
They are free from the burdens common to man;
they are not plagued by human ills.
Therefore pride is their necklace;
they clothe themselves with violence.
From their callous hearts comes iniquity;
the evil conceits of their minds know no limits.
They scoff, and speak with malice;
in their arrogance they threaten oppression.
Their mouths lay claim to heaven,
and their tongues take possession of the earth.
Therefore their people turn to them and drink up waters in abundance.

They say, "How can God know?

Does the Most High have knowledge?"
This is what the wicked are like—always carefree, they increase in wealth.

This we will explore in the next section.

The example of Jesus. But before we turn to Contemporary Significance, we need to introduce one more perspective on the passage that will also be more fully developed in the next section. We have already recognized that Jesus himself indicates that there are many passages of the Old Testament that pertain to his coming (Luke 24:25–27, 44–49). As Augustine said so well, "the New Testament in the Old is concealed, the Old is in the New revealed."

Even without Jesus' invitation and Augustine's catchy motto, how could those of us who read the New Testament fail to think of Christ in the light of Nebuchadnezzar's pride and shame? After all, Nebuchadnezzar was a mere man who glorified himself as if he were a god. Paul sings the following praise concerning Jesus (Phil. 2:6–11):

Who, being in the very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped,
but made himself nothing,
taking the very nature of a servant,
being made in human likeness.
And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself
and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!
Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow,
in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

What can we make of the truly glorious one, God himself, who voluntarily humbles himself to take on the flesh of humankind in the light of a mortal

Contemporary Significance

TAKING COMFORT IN knowing God is in control. As mentioned above, the overarching message of this chapter repeats an already common theme in the book. No matter what the odds, God is in control. Fate, or even intentional evil, may seem to have the upper hand against us, but the reality is that God is in control. In the present chapter, we observe this as God effortlessly reduces the most powerful man in the most sophisticated city in the world to a beast-like state in the wilderness.

God's people are called to take comfort in this truth, whether they lived at the time of Nebuchadnezzar, at a later time of persecution, or even today. Today Christians in certain parts of the world feel the chain of persecution and oppression because of their faith. Just within the past few months of the time of the writing of this commentary, the media has reported incredible instances of Christian persecution at the hands of government authorities. A recent issue of Christianity Today contains reports of execution by beheading of two Filipino Christians in Saudi Arabia, of government officials who interfere with the spreading of the gospel in Serbia, and of attacks on the house churches of China.¹⁹

We as Christians in America and England, though chafing at occasional restrictions of the exercise of our religion, do not really experience true religious persecution at the hands of the state. Nonetheless, all Christians, including those of us who have unprecedented freedom to exercise religion, understand the feeling of facing an obstacle that seems insuperable. We all encounter an enemy over which we seem to have no power, whether that foe is a crippling disability, a psychological disorder, a terminal disease, an abusive spouse, or the like. In this sense, the message of Daniel is for all of us, not just the politically oppressed. No one escapes the frustrations and chaos of a world suffering from the effects of the Fall (Rom. 8:18–27).

God humbles the proud. But is the message of Daniel 4 true? Is God able to humble those who walk in pride (v. 37)? Is God able to defeat those who harm us and overcome the obstacles to life and faith that threaten to engulf us? Or is Daniel 4 just a thrilling story with little connection to reality?

(1) We have seen above that the composer of Psalm 73 had his doubts. It seemed to him that the arrogant had no problems. The Teacher in the book of Ecclesiastes struggled as well. His faith taught that the godly would prosper and arrogant and evil people would languish, but that is not what he saw in the world. Not only that, but he saw death as the ultimate victor over life, rendering all the good deeds and achievements of life meaningless. Even in death, the wicked were honored: "There is a time when a man lords it over others to his own hurt. Then too, I saw the wicked buried—those who used to come and go from the holy place and receive praise in the city where they did this" (Eccl. 8:9b–10).

Isn't this also our experience? Who are the famous, the powerful, the wealthy, the tanned and smiling faces we see out there? Are they the faces of the saints? Occasionally, but more often than not they are the faces of those who sneer at religion and serve to undermine it.

But if we look more closely at the Bible, we do see that God humbles the proud. It began in the Garden of Eden. Adam and Eve enjoyed a close and intimate relationship with their Creator in the Garden. As the well-known story continues, however, their trust in God diminished, and they came, at the prompting of the serpent, to trust their own judgment. In a word, pride instigated them to break the one commandment that their friend and God told them to observe. As a result, their idyllic life in the Garden was transformed to a life of hard work and drudgery "under the sun." They exchanged their glory for shame and ended up being humbled.²⁰

Another story with notable connections to Daniel 4 is the account of the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11. Again, pride led to rebellion, even an assault on heaven itself. Human beings presumed to be godlike by building a staircase to heaven. God, however, intervened, reducing the arrogant to humility and scattering them over the face of the earth.

The humble faithful can find comfort in these accounts of the reversal of pride into shame. Indeed, the psalmist of Psalm 73 finally came to his senses (vv. 17–22). He was like a "brute beast" before God until he "entered the sanctuary of God" and "understood [the] final destiny" of the arrogant and prosperous people, who ignored or attacked God. In other words, his vision was expanded beyond immediate circumstances. While the proud ultimately will be "swept away by terrors" (v. 19), he proclaims as one of the oppressed faithful (vv. 23–24):

Yet I am always with you; you hold me by my right hand. You guide me with your counsel, and afterward you will take me into glory.

Certainly, I would agree that the passage cannot be read as a certain affirmation of life after death. However, I think it is wrong to attribute to this psalmist, struggling with the fact that proper rewards and punishments do not seem to be handed out in this life, a naive idea that "it's all going to turn out all right after all in this life."

And apart from Old Testament anticipation, the New Testament makes it even more clear that God is in control. He has won a victory over an enemy even more powerful than Nebuchadnezzar, over a kingdom even more deadly and oppressive than the Babylonian empire. He has defeated Satan and death itself. The book of Revelation, often likening the powers of evil to Babylon of old, shows God's ultimate victory on behalf of his faithful people.²¹

(2) But before we pass on, we cannot neglect a warning. While Daniel 4 demonstrates God's ability to humble the arrogant leader of a foreign oppressive empire—an enemy "out there," so to speak—we must be careful concerning the pride that can infect our own lives. Christians are not immune from a pride that removes our eyes from God and places them squarely on ourselves. Indeed, it is precisely in situations like ours in the West, where we do not face active persecution, that this danger is most obvious.

After all, Christians have succeeded in business, in sports, in media, and in religion. We run large companies, score touchdowns in the NFL, write popular books, and pastor megachurches. The danger is there as we watch the thousands (or even the tens of thousands) of people who flock into our church to feel confident about the attractiveness of our preaching. The danger is there to feel satisfaction in the number of books we have sold or awards we have won. We have the same tendencies that Adam had as he walked intimately with God, but then trusted his own judgment more than God.

In other words, the message that God humbles the proud is not only a comfort; it is a warning to us all. With the psalmist (and unlike Nebuchadnezzar) we must remember Psalm 127:1:

Unless the LORD builds the house,its builders labor in vain.Unless the LORD watches over the city,the watchmen stand guard in vain.

With Paul, rather than praising ourselves for our accomplishments, we must remember to boast only in the Lord (1 Cor. 1:29, 31; 2 Cor. 10:17).

Redemptive shame. This message is an important one to remember in our present day and age, where self-esteem is in and guilt and shame are out. Many people think that shame is inherently evil and that we must foster a strong sense of self-worth in ourselves and in others.

Don't get me wrong. There is such a thing as a false sense of shame. Indeed, we must help people recognize when their shame is based on an incorrect perception or a false standard of success.²² But there is also a true and redemptive sense of shame that we should not hide under the carpet. A true shame is a shame engendered as a result of our rebellion and sin before God. It is when our sin is exposed before God and, at times, before other people, that our embarrassment can propel us into the arms of God.

This redemptive shame is the shame experienced by Nebuchadnezzar. His overweening pride was rightfully exposed, and he was shown to be a brute beast on his own power; even his sanity was a gift from God. His humiliating experience compelled him to look at God again, and he was restored to his former dignity.

Again, several psalms illustrate this dynamic. Psalm 30 embeds the story of someone whom God blessed so that he prospered greatly. However, he forgot that his success was a gift and began to focus his eyes on himself. At that point, God turned his back on the psalmist and let him feel the shame of powerlessness (Ps. 30:6–7):

When I felt secure, I said,
"I will never be shaken."
O LORD, when you favored me, you made my mountain stand firm;

but when you hid your face, I was dismayed.

This psalm, however, is not a lament; it is a psalm of thanksgiving. The shame that the author experienced caused him to flee to God again. The result is clear: "You turned my wailing into dancing; you removed my sackcloth and clothed me with joy" (v. 11).

Our God is a God who turns shame into rejoicing. But he does not do this by some sort of magical fiat. The gospel story is the story of God himself experiencing shame on our behalf. He subjected himself to the humiliation of the cross. Christ felt shame, but he underwent the experience in order to free us from shame and invite us to the glory of the resurrection. "Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:2).

Jesus endured the shame of the cross because of joy—joy in glorifying his Father, and joy in redeeming his brothers and sisters (see Heb. 12:11–12). We are invited to bear his disgrace and offer ourselves as a sacrifice of praise to God's glory and goodness.²³

Daniel 5:1-31

¹King Belshazzar gave a great banquet for a thousand of his nobles and drank wine with them. ²While Belshazzar was drinking his wine, he gave orders to bring in the gold and silver goblets that Nebuchadnezzar his father had taken from the temple in Jerusalem, so that the king and his nobles, his wives and his concubines might drink from them. ³So they brought in the gold goblets that had been taken from the temple of God in Jerusalem, and the king and his nobles, his wives and his concubines drank from them. ⁴As they drank the wine, they praised the gods of gold and silver, of bronze, iron, wood and stone.

⁵Suddenly the fingers of a human hand appeared and wrote on the plaster of the wall, near the lampstand in the royal palace. The king watched the hand as it wrote. ⁶His face turned pale and he was so frightened that his knees knocked together and his legs gave way.

⁷The king called out for the enchanters, astrologers and diviners to be brought and said to these wise men of Babylon, "Whoever reads this writing and tells me what it means will be clothed in purple and have a gold chain placed around his neck, and he will be made the third highest ruler in the kingdom."

⁸Then all the king's wise men came in, but they could not read the writing or tell the king what it meant. ⁹So King Belshazzar became even more terrified and his face grew more pale. His nobles were baffled.

¹⁰The queen, hearing the voices of the king and his nobles, came into the banquet hall. "O king, live forever!" she said. "Don't be alarmed! Don't look so pale! ¹¹There is a man in your kingdom who has the spirit of the holy gods in him. In the time of your father he was found to have insight and intelligence and wisdom like that of the gods. King Nebuchadnezzar your father—your father the king, I say—appointed him chief of the magicians, enchanters, astrologers and diviners. ¹²This man Daniel, whom the king called Belteshazzar, was found to have a keen mind and knowledge and understanding, and also the ability to interpret dreams, explain riddles and solve difficult problems. Call for Daniel, and he will tell you what the writing means."

13So Daniel was brought before the king, and the king said to him, "Are you Daniel, one of the exiles my father the king brought from Judah? ¹⁴I have heard that the spirit of the gods is in you and that you have insight, intelligence and outstanding wisdom. ¹⁵The wise men and enchanters were brought before me to read this writing and tell me what it means, but they could not explain it. ¹⁶Now I have heard that you are able to give interpretations and to solve difficult problems. If you can read this writing and tell me what it means, you will be clothed in purple and have a gold chain placed around your neck, and you will be made the third highest ruler in the kingdom."

¹⁷Then Daniel answered the king, "You may keep your gifts for yourself and give your rewards to someone else. Nevertheless, I will read the writing for the king and tell him what it means.

¹⁸"O king, the Most High God gave your father Nebuchadnezzar sovereignty and greatness and glory and splendor. ¹⁹Because of the high position he gave him, all the peoples and nations and men of every language dreaded and feared him. Those the king wanted to put to death, he put to death; those he wanted to spare, he spared; those he wanted to promote, he promoted; and those he wanted to humble, he humbled. ²⁰But when his heart became arrogant and hardened with pride, he was deposed from his royal throne and stripped of his glory. ²¹He was driven away from people and given the mind of an animal; he lived with the wild donkeys and ate grass like cattle; and his body was drenched with the dew of heaven, until he acknowledged that the Most High God is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and sets over them anyone he wishes.

22"But you his son, O Belshazzar, have not humbled yourself, though you knew all this.
23 Instead, you have set yourself up against the Lord of heaven. You had the goblets from his temple brought to you, and you and your nobles, your wives and your concubines drank wine from them. You praised the gods of silver and gold, of bronze, iron, wood and stone, which cannot see or hear or understand. But you did not honor the God who holds in his hand your life and all your ways.
24 Therefore he sent the hand that wrote the inscription.

²⁵"This is the inscription that was written: MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN ²⁶"This is what these words mean:

Mene: God has numbered the days of your reign and brought it to an end.

²⁷Tekel: You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting.

²⁸Peres: Your kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians."

²⁹Then at Belshazzar's command, Daniel was clothed in purple, a gold chain was placed around his neck, and he was proclaimed the third highest ruler in the kingdom.

³⁰That very night Belshazzar, king of the Babylonians, was slain, ³¹and Darius the Mede took over the kingdom, at the age of sixty-two.

Original Meaning

As WE READ Daniel 5, we begin to get a sense of déjà vu. Though many of the faces are different, the genre, the plot, the sins, the props, and the themes of this chapter echo from earlier ones. To begin a partial list of similarities, we once again have a court narrative. Daniel 5 gives us an account of Daniel the wise man and prophet in the court of a foreign king. Further, as in Daniel 1, 2, and 4 we witness a court contest (as opposed to a court conflict, as in chs. 3 and 6). Unlike Daniel 2, however, the focus is not on the conflict between the Babylonian wise men and Daniel, though this is an important element of the story.

As in chapters 2 and 4, Daniel can interpret an enigmatic dream or vision where the native Babylonian wisdom teachers fail. Like Daniel 4, the king demonstrates incredible arrogance and is put in his place by God. Furthermore, the account of the conquest of Jerusalem in chapter 1 paid special attention to the theft of the temple vessels (1:2), and these play an important role in the present chapter.

Dana Fewell argues for a connection between the setting of Daniel 3 and that of chapter 5. In both, the king (Nebuchadnezzar in ch. 3 and Belshazzar, "his son," in ch. 5) convenes the important people of his empire. In chapter 3, the assembly is for the dedication of a statue, while here it is for a banquet. Fewell argues, though the text is not explicit on the point, that both events were public displays of loyalty toward the king. Perhaps she is correct, but the reticence of the text will keep us from developing this theme at length.

Nonetheless, as we proceed with our section-by-section interpretation of this chapter, we will also notice new emphases. Most notably, we observe a different attitude expressed by Daniel toward the foreign king. Prior to this moment, Daniel had been favorably disposed toward the king. Though responsible for the downfall of the Judean people, Daniel cared for Nebuchadnezzar and did not rejoice in his downfall. The king had shown himself someone quick to learn from his mistakes. Here, however, Daniel has little time or concern for Belshazzar. He seems only too happy to tell him of his dire fate. We will be exploring this matter further.

Because of the similarity between Daniel 4 and 5, we are not surprised that the theme of the chapters may be formulated in a similar way. Daniel 4 focused on Nebuchadnezzar's pride, Daniel 5 on Belshazzar's. The latter's pride will be expressed in the context of idolatry in a way that Nebuchadnezzar's was not (though see comments on ch. 3). The major difference between chapters 4 and 5 is in the response of the king. In Daniel 4, Nebuchadnezzar ultimately repents of his arrogance and is restored to his former position. In Daniel 5, Belshazzar does not repent and is destroyed.

Thus, the theme of Daniel 5 fits into the theme of the whole book: In spite of present appearances, God is in control. This theme is important in the context of the oppression of God's people at the hands of arrogant pagan rulers like Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. In the case of the former, God shows how he can overcome the pride of a powerful ruler by humbling him into repentance. In the case of the latter, God shows what he does with one who remains unrepentant. In either case, God shows himself to be more powerful than these hostile yet powerful kings, thus again giving comfort to his faithful, suffering people.

The main character of Daniel 5 is Belshazzar, a king whom we have not yet met and whose presence in the narrative raises interesting and difficult historical questions. The transition from Daniel 4 to 5 is an abrupt one, and Belshazzar is thrust on the stage with no indication of the passage of time or the death of Nebuchadnezzar. This information is unnecessary for the purposes of the narrative, but it does raise questions in our mind, particularly since the rather full extrabiblical accounts of the lineage of neo-Babylonian kings make no mention of a king called Belshazzar. After the death of Nebuchadnezzar in 562 B.C., he was succeeded by his son Amel-Marduk (the Evil-Merodach of 2 Kings 25:27) for a short period of time (562–560 B.C.). He was executed, probably at the behest of his successor, Neriglissar, who ruled only a few years himself (560–556 B.C.). Neriglissar was succeeded by his son Labashi-Marduk, who reigned for only a few months before he was executed by the party that brought Nabonidus to the throne. Nabonidus is recorded as the last king of the Babylonians, since he ruled until the time Cyrus entered Babylon and brought his kingdom to an end (539 B.C.).

So what about Belshazzar? Until recently Belshazzar was thought to be one of those errors in the Bible's understanding of history that led many to doubt its accuracy. However, after the discovery and decipherment of cuneiform tablets began in the nineteenth century, we began to learn more and more about the period in question. As a result, Belshazzar emerged from the shadows as a definite historical character. Today we have abundant textual witness to the fact that he was the son of Nabonidus. More than that, Belshazzar was coregent and actually in charge of Babylon during his father's ten-year absence from the capital city, thus explaining the reference to him as king.²

The story of Nabonidus's absence from Babylon is an intriguing one, but we will only give the mere outline of the story. In short, Nabonidus was a devotee of the moon god Sin, the chief god of his ancestral homeland Haran. While not a monotheist, he was interested in promoting the interests of Sin, which apparently angered the powerful Marduk priesthood. Evidence exists that his son, Belshazzar, did not share his devotion to Sin and may even have led a party that, while not forcing Nabonidus to abdicate, did result in his abandonment of the capital to take up residence at a site called Teima, located at an oasis in what is today Saudi Arabia.

But much of the story is clouded in obscurity, and other motivations may have been important for the move. Teima was the location of an important trade route and Nabonidus was protecting this trade route. It seems likely, however, that the religious tensions played an important role in his decision.

This information explains, at least in broad terms, the presence of Belshazzar as ruler in Babylon even though he is not listed as one of the kings of Babylon. While not all the questions have been answered, we have moved a long way from the days when Belshazzar was considered a figment of a later writer's imagination. We should remember this when we encounter similar problems, and indeed we will as early as the end of our chapter and the next as we meet a new figure, Darius the Mede.

Daniel 5 may be outlined as follows: (1) the profanation of the holy vessels (5:1–4); (2) the enigmatic writing on the wall (5:5–12); (3) Daniel's interpretation of the inscription (5:13–28); (4) reward and punishment (5:29–31).

The Profanation of the Holy Vessels (5:1–4)

KING BELSHAZZAR MAKES a sudden and unanticipated appearance in the narrative. He is not introduced; he springs into the action. No one today doubts that the last king of Babylon had a son named Belshazzar, who ruled as coregent during the last days of the empire. Skepticism remains,⁴ however, on some of the details, most notably the narrative's description of Nebuchadnezzar as his "father" (v. 2). Indeed, though not impossible, it is unlikely that Belshazzar was the son of Nebuchadnezzar in the narrow, biological sense. Historical records indicate that Nabonidus, himself not a biological descendant of Nebuchadnezzar, was Belshazzar's father. It is more likely that "father" is used here in the sense of "predecessor." ⁵

In the story itself, we learn little about Belshazzar from straightforward description; his character is revealed through his actions and speeches. He throws a huge banquet for one thousand of his nobles. The description of this boisterous party reminds us of the opening of the book of Esther, where Xerxes' banquet provided the setting for the first story of that book. That banquet, according to Karen Jobes⁶ and others, was intended to unite the leaders of the empire on the eve of Xerxes' attempted conquest of Greece. The broader textual and historical setting of Daniel 5 suggests that a similar political-military purpose was at work in Belshazzar's mind.

In a word, the Persians are knocking at the door of the Babylonian empire. Indeed, as the end of the story indicates, they will take the city of Babylon the very next day. Extrabiblical sources, both cuneiform and Greek (Herodotus and Xenophon), give us more information about the events leading up to the fall of Babylon on October 12, 539 B.C.⁷

The final victory may have been a surprise attack on Babylon. Indeed, Herodotus and Xenophon indicate that the final raid on Babylon took place during a nighttime banquet. But even if the final raid was sudden, it could not have been unanticipated. The Babylonian Chronicle indicates that just a couple of days earlier, Cyrus the Persian had defeated Nabonidus and the Babylonian army near Sippar (approximately fifty miles from Babylon). Nabonidus had fled the scene, though not to the capital.

Belshazzar must have known that an attack would come sooner or later. It was in this context that the banquet described in our chapter took place. Was it to rally and encourage the leaders? To give them a diversion in the face of the onslaught? To feast today for tomorrow we die? Perhaps a bit of all three, but we are safe to assume that tension permeated the air in the Babylonian capital at this time.

Wine flowed abundantly at the banquet. The king and his nobles drank deeply together. The text does not emphasize the drinking, however, to provide a moral lesson on the dangers of thinking under the influence of alcohol. No, the focus shifts to the holy goblets that Nebuchadnezzar had removed from the temple. These precious temple vessels are about to be profaned by being pressed into common use. We do not know much about how they were used in the rituals of the temple, but we do know that they were not intended for a raucous party. Belshazzar's impiety portends dire consequences.

We cannot be certain what was going on in Belshazzar's mind at this time. But surely he did not just run out of his everyday goblets and called for the spares. He surely had a particular propaganda purpose in mind. But what? He may have been making claims to power by comparing himself to his "father" Nebuchadnezzar. He trifles with Nebuchadnezzar's war booty, a booty that Nebuchadnezzar himself apparently thought too precious actually to use. Perhaps in the midst of the present crisis Belshazzar is claiming more power than Nebuchadnezzar, a boast vain enough in itself.

But the challenge Belshazzar presents goes even further in his mind. Perhaps the challenge is leveled against Yahweh himself. Miller points out that Daniel had predicted the Persian victory over Babylonia during Belshazzar's reign (8:1–4, 15–20), and already by the time of Isaiah God's prophets were indicating such an end to the one-time oppressors (Isa. 44:28; 45:1); but how likely is it that Belshazzar is familiar with Isaiah's prophecy?¹⁰ While some scholars argue that Belshazzar probably offended many foreign religious cults that night, our text indicates that Yahweh is the sole focus. In the final analysis, it does not matter what was going on in Belshazzar's mind; his very act is like spitting in the eye of God.

But Belshazzar goes even further in his sacrilege. He is not only committing blasphemy, he combines it with idolatry. Here is where his profanation surpasses that of Nebuchadnezzar. He uses God's holy goblets to toast the lifeless idols of his own religion. He spits in God's eye, as it were, and then he goes over to a statue that he himself has created (v. 4) and expects that lifeless hunk to protect him from what is to come.

The manner in which the narrative describes Belshazzar's affirmation of idolatry shows how ridiculous it is. Belshazzar's gods are of the same material as the goblets from Yahweh's temple. The latter are important, holy, and precious, but they are not God himself. Those objects made out of precious metals are not objects of worship, but Belshazzar's perverted religion puts their material cousins at the heart of his confidence and hope for the future.

The Enigmatic Writing on the Wall (5:5–12)

THE ACTION OF this chapter moves quickly and with sudden surprises. Just as Belshazzar has appeared without introduction, so a hand suddenly appears without explanation. Of course, a disembodied hand writing a message on the wall of the palace needs no explanation to recognize a supernatural occurrence.

This hand is surely the hand of God. The faithful reader of the past and present has no doubts who is behind the writing, though to be sure, Belshazzar has no clue. As a polytheist, he could have seen the hand as controlled by any of a number of different divinities. Immediately, however, he suspects that the enigmatic writing has a message that intends calamity toward him. His reaction is shock and utter fright. He is in extreme distress, perhaps even implying by the last clause that he has lost control of his most basic bodily functions, which has undermined his posture of composure.¹¹

The reference to the "fingers" of God should not surprise us. Though God has no body, his actions are frequently described metaphorically as the acts of his hand. Indeed, in three other notable Scripture references, God's finger is at work. In response to the plagues, the Egyptian magicians remarked, "This is the finger of God" (Ex. 8:19). Exodus also describes the commandments as written by God's finger on the stone tablets (31:18). Finally, the heavens themselves are "the work of [his] fingers" (Ps. 8:3).

The throne room of the kings of Babylon was excavated by Koldewey in 1899.¹² Of course, the message recorded here has not been found, nor are the walls intact, but enough is left to show that the walls were coated with white gypsum, which means that the writing would be clear on the wall, especially considering the text's note that the writing took place "near the lampstand." The public nature of the writing as well as the fact that the wise men and finally Daniel also read the writing belie the idea that this is some sort of private vision or drunken hallucination.¹³

Belshazzar cannot make head nor tails of the writing, so he calls for the wise men. By now the reader of the book of Daniel cannot help but picture these men as incompetent fools, and they don't disappoint our expectations. The king entices them with the promise of great reward, virtually offering them royalty. To be third in the kingdom means to rank only after himself and his father, Nabonidus. ¹⁴ That a coregency is intended is underlined by the purple garment and the necklace, which surely denoted royal authority.

In spite of the reward, the wise men are baffled by the inscription. This means at the very least that they cannot interpret the significance of the inscription. It may also imply that it was written in some kind of code, because it has been written in Aramaic, the common language of the day. Their inability cannot be the result of a simple inability to read the script, if it were written out in a normal manner. The text ultimately does not let us know.

At this point, the queen whisks onto the stage without detailed introduction or explanation, again leading to speculation. Who is the queen? She has not been attending the party, but she enters at the moment of crisis, acting with authority and dignified confidence. We know that Belshazzar's wives and concubines are already in attendance (v. 3). All the circumstantial evidence points to the queen mother, a figure of importance in many ancient Near Eastern societies. Ever since Josephus the queen here has been identified as the queen mother.

But whose mother? If Belshazzar's mother, we do not know her name. If the mother of his father Nabonidus, then it is the venerated Adad-guppi, who lived to the ripe old age of 104; she may be the one who brought Nabonidus and his son to the throne. However, we know from historical sources that she died a few years before this moment. The queen therefore may have been Nebuchadnezzar's wife, Nitocris, still exerting her influence more than two decades later. Herodotus, the Greek historian, celebrates her wisdom. Greek historian, celebrates her wisdom.

Whoever she is, she has the solution to Belshazzar's problem: "Get Daniel." Daniel has come through in the past in similar situations. She chides Belshazzar for his panic, unbefitting a king, and for his ignorance of Daniel, who had played an important role in Nebuchadnezzar's court. We can detect irritation in her voice concerning his demeaning of his illustrious royal predecessor. Indeed, Fewell argues that Daniel is not called immediately more out of disdain for his past association with Nebuchadnezzar than because of his age (around eighty at the time) and because of the twenty-three years that have passed since Nebuchadnezzar's death.¹⁷ Whatever the explanation, the scene is set for Daniel's grand entrance onto the scene.

Daniel's Interpretation of the Inscription (5:13–28)

SO FAR, MOST of the main characters—Belshazzar, the hand of God, the queen—have appeared suddenly and without introduction. In contrast, the author prepares us for Daniel's entrance. This is the third time that Daniel intervenes and succeeds where the Babylonian wise men fail (cf. Dan. 2 and 4). But when Daniel comes this time, he manifests a new attitude.

First the king speaks. A close reading of the text reveals a condescending attitude by Belshazzar toward this man who played such a significant role in Nebuchadnezzar's life, a role concerning which he is fully aware (cf. v. 22). The king first identifies him as one of the captives: "Are you Daniel, one of the exiles my father the king brought from Judah?" (v. 13). Such an address intends to remind Daniel of his place before Belshazzar. Belshazzar is king; Daniel is his captive. Calvin understood the tone of the king's speech when he states that "the king does not acknowledge his negligence but interrogates Daniel without shame—and interrogates him as if he were a prisoner." ¹⁸

Belshazzar then launches off a series of honorifics that cite Daniel's abilities and character, but again a close reading of the speech shows that the king himself does not endorse the reports. Twice he begins his words with "I have heard," once when speaking of Daniel's endowment with the divine spirit, insight, intelligence, and wisdom (v. 14), and again when saying that Daniel is one who can give interpretations and solve difficult problems (v. 16). Contrast this with what Nebuchadnezzar had earlier simply asserted: "I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in you, and no mystery is too difficult for you. Here is my dream; interpret it for me" (4:9). Belshazzar's flattery is more provisional and his request for interpretation, accordingly, is conditional: "If you can read this writing and tell me what it means ..." (v. 16).

Belshazzar's speech reveals that his expectations are not high, but he holds out the same reward of royal status to the aged Israelite wise man standing before him as he earlier did to the hapless Babylonian wise men (v. 16).

Daniel has not missed the slight. The abruptness and the content of the king's lengthy speech indicates the prophet's annoyance and dislike for this second-rate monarch. In earlier chapters, when he spoke to Nebuchadnezzar, he used respect and concern. Again, Calvin has caught the flavor of the speech: "I have no doubt that he meant to speak roughly to the ungodly Belshazzar, a man beyond hope; but because there had been still some uprightness left in King Nebuchadnezzar and he had good hopes in him, he had treated him more gently." 19

Daniel begins by refusing the gift. He will interpret the writing on the wall free of charge. We will return to this topic again in the next section, because as it turns out Daniel will accept the reward. However, for now he alerts the king that his primary motivation is not worldly reward. Indeed, perhaps having read the inscription already, Daniel knows that the reward means nothing. The king has nothing really to give.

But before actually giving the interpretation, Daniel delivers a stinging rebuke to the king. Beginning with Samuel in his relation with Saul (cf. 1 Sam. 13, 15), a major role of the prophet has been to serve as the conscience of the king. True, this role was primarily directed toward the Israelite king. Whenever the latter fell to the temptation of power and forgot who the ultimate king was, the prophet was there to remind him (cf. also Nathan's relationship with David [2 Sam. 12], Elijah's with Ahab [1 Kings 18], and Jeremiah's with Jehoiakim [Jer. 36]). Now Belshazzar hears Daniel. He uses Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar's predecessor and by far superior, to redress the upstart, who is not only probably young and really the second in command to his father Nabonidus, but is also on the brink of disaster. Nebuchadnezzar was great, but when God confronted him, he ultimately acknowledged his subservience.

Belshazzar did not learn the lesson. He should have known better, thanks to the example of Nebuchadnezzar. Nonetheless, far from acknowledging his subservience to a greater power, Belshazzar went far beyond the sins of his predecessor by directly assaulting Yahweh through the profane and idolatrous use of the holy vessels of the temple. This admonition explains the presence of the hand and its inscription. The time is ripe for its interpretation.

For the first time, then, we as readers hear the words: "MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN." As presented in the text, these are three different nouns, the first repeated for emphasis. As nouns, they are units of money and may be translated: "Mina, mina, shekel, and a half." The half could be either half a mina or half a shekel. Though in other contexts it appears to be the former, the context here seems to indicate a half shekel. Nonetheless, Daniel's interpretation takes these nouns and interprets them as verbal forms, passive participles to be exact. The three verbal roots in order may be translated "numbered," "weighed," and "divided."

Different rationales have been offered for the apparent discrepancy between the grammatical form of the words and Daniel's interpretation.²⁰ However, we must remember that Daniel is in the position of the divinely inspired interpreter and his answer is rightly explained by Towner as based upon folk etymologies of the three words, each turning on a pun. The three nouns listed in verse 25 are treated as three passive verbs by Daniel in verses 26–28: MENE is related to the verb m-n-h "numbered"; TEKEL is related to the verb t-q-l, "weighed"; and PERES is construed as the verb p-r-s, "divided."²¹

As Goldingay has stated it, "Daniel uses [the writing] to make the statement refer to Belshazzar's being appointed, evaluated, and punished."²² In the interpretation, parsin is given in the singular form peres, and both are reminiscent of the name Persia, the nation that is about to devour the once mighty empire of Babylonia.

In an insightful recent article, Al Wolters argues that the Babylonian wise men stumbled because the inscription was written in scripta continua and without vocalization: mn'tqlprs. He goes on to say that "the interpretation given by Daniel divides this series into three words of three letters, each with three levels of meaning, depending on the vocalization chosen." The first two levels of meaning are as above—the letters divided and vocalized as nouns and then as passive participles, though he interprets the third verb as "assessed" rather than "divided." The third level of interpretation, based on yet a third vocalization (menah, tiqqal, paras), indicates the consequences of God's judgment on Babylonia: "He has paid out, you are too light [pe'al of qll], Persia!" Wolters continues by arguing that the image of scales that weigh permeate all three levels and "gains further significance when we realize that the annual rising of Libra took place on the eve of Babylon's fall to the Persians."²⁴

Wolters's insightful interpretation may be supplemented by an article by Rabbi Dr. Michael Hilton, who points out the connections of the tower of Babel story in Genesis 11:1–9, which associates the beginning of Babylonia with a confusion of language, with Daniel 5, which associates its end with a confusion.²⁵

That Belshazzar has ruled at all—indeed, that Babylon has achieved ascendancy as the major power of the world—has been at God's sovereign determination, but it was a temporary period now at an end. Belshazzar and the Babylonians have not measured up, and so now another power will come to the throne, one dominated by Persia, which includes the Medes. No further explanation is needed from Daniel; the message is clear, and it spells doom.

Reward and Punishment (5:29-31)

GOD'S JUDGMENT IS double-edged. As he punishes his enemies, so he frees and rewards his people. Here, two individuals represent the dual fates of the godly and the ungodly.

(1) Belshazzar bestows the purple garments, the gold chain, and high political status on godly Daniel. Commentators have expressed much consternation as they try to figure out what is going on in the mind of Daniel. After all, earlier he had treated the possibility of reward with disdain, but now he accepts them without recorded objection. Perhaps Daniel waited until after the interpretation to accept reward in order not to have his ministry polluted by the promise of worldly reward, but the text does not say that. Perhaps he accepted the reward because he knew that within hours it would be meaningless, but the text does not say that either.

While the text does not give us a window to Daniel's motivation, the scene does communicate that his interpretation is true and that its truth is even admitted by Belshazzar, the king. It also shows us that the godly ultimately receive their reward even from hostile and reluctant oppressors. Indeed, we might go further to point out that Belshazzar's downfall and Darius the Medes' ascendancy is a boon to the people of God as a whole. Though not narrated by the book of Daniel, the Persian-Median rise to power leads quickly to the Decree of Cyrus (Ezra 1:1–4), which allowed the return of the Jewish people to Palestine.

(2) The chapter ends by narrating the consequences of Belshazzar's ungodly acts. "That very night Belshazzar, king of the Babylonians, was slain, and Darius the Mede took over the kingdom, at the age of sixty-two" (Dan. 5:30–31). We will reserve our discussion of the mysterious Darius the Mede until the next chapter, which is set during his reign. It appears that he was Cyrus's general, who made the final raid on Babylon and killed Belshazzar in the process. Thus, we witness the reward granted to insolence, idolatry, and blasphemy.

Bridging Contexts

Daniel, thus justifying our use of this material as a guide to our behavior.

We have also seen that these chapters dealing with history have the feel of a story rather than, say, a documentary. The latter would focus on a disclosure of the facts, an emphasis on what really happened; the former tells the account in a literarily satisfying manner. It selects events and shapes its presentation to support an important theological and/or ethical message. We are caught up in the intrigue, the suspense, the drama of the scene. We are drawn to change our beliefs, our attitudes, and our actions. History and story are not mutually exclusive categories. True, a substance of a story can be make-believe, but it can also be from real life.

Our point is that Daniel 5 is properly described as history, but it is more than brute fact history. Indeed, it is the genre of text that compels us to understand this chapter as more than a simple report of what happened in the past. A proper reception of the story invites us to look for important theological and ethical principles that are still relevant for today (see below). As we take these principles and consider their appropriateness for today, we will do so through the prism of the New Testament, noting that there is always the possibility of discontinuity between the Old Testament story and our own situation.

The reticent narrator. Daniel 5 illustrates clearly an important characteristic that runs throughout the theological history of the Old Testament. Old Testament history with infrequent exceptions (e.g., Ezra 7–10; Neh. 1–7; 11–13) tells its story through the eyes of an unnamed narrator. In literary studies, this style is called third-person omniscient narration. That is, the narrator describes the action, reports speech, and interprets the significance of the events to us, the readers. He is a storyteller, who can move from one side of a battle to another, from the internal workings of one mind to another. In some Old Testament stories, he even tells us what passes through the mind of God.

Daniel 5 is not given to us from the perspective of Daniel, the character, but rather through the eyes of this unnamed narrator. While this form of narration is common in literature, literary scholars have pointed out that in the Bible it gives us the impression that we receive the story from a divine perspective.²⁷ Thus, this form of narration gives us a high level of confidence in the story. We trust this narrator.

We may further characterize our narrator in a way that helps us interpret the story and also gives us guidelines as we seek to bridge the horizon from the ancient world to the modern. In a word, the narrator of biblical stories is reticent. That is, he is spare in his commentary. As we read Daniel 5, we do not get much background description or explicit statement of motivations. We are thus left with a number of questions, as we have noted above: Why is Belshazzar holding a banquet? Who is the queen? Why couldn't the Babylonian wise men read the inscription? Why is Daniel upset with Belshazzar in a way that he was not with Nebuchadnezzar?

The reticence of the narrator invites our involvement as readers. It peaks our interest and gets us thinking deeply about what is going on. It is not that the story does not give us any clues. The narrator shows us rather than explicitly tells us important information about the plot and characters. He describes the action and, in this chapter, narrates the characters' speeches in a way to shape our reaction.

As interpreters, it is our task to read between the lines without reading into the story elements that are not there—a fine line to walk, to be sure. However, our reading in the gaps must be justified by what is presented in the text itself; otherwise, our interpretation should be discounted as just so much eisegesis.

Déjà vu all over again. As we turn our attention to chapter 5 for principles that remain relevant for our contemporary situation, we again are struck by the repetition of themes from earlier chapters. Belshazzar's first and final episode in the stories of Daniel is marked by his arrogance, blasphemy, and idolatry.

(1) Arrogance. Pride was an issue in the preceding chapters, especially chapter 4. There we observed how Nebuchadnezzar, even though warned, succumbed to a promotion of himself, even above God. He looked at Babylon and gave himself the praise. As a result, God humbled him by reducing him to an animal-like state until he acknowledged God's superiority, at which time he was reinstated to his former human glory.

Belshazzar has not learned from his predecessor's example. He too exalts himself above God. The story illustrates his attitude by narrating his misuse of the holy temple vessels, and Daniel articulates this divine evaluation in his prophetic rebuke (vv. 22–23) even before lowering the boom of judgment on him. God humbles Belshazzar as well, but in this case there is no restoration. He is killed for his sin.

(2) Blasphemy. While repeating his predecessor's sin of arrogance, Belshazzar takes it to a new level of offense against Yahweh. He expresses his superiority not by taking inordinate pride in his own achievements, but by profaning the things associated with God. True, by virtue of their theft from the temple and their being handled by nonpriestly, non-Israelite hands, the vessels have already been profaned; but because of the use Belshazzar makes of them, he supersedes previous denigration of God's holy objects.

As we commented above, we do not know Belshazzar's motivation in bringing out the up-to-this-point unused temple vessels. On the level of conscious intention, was he tweaking the memory of his great royal predecessor or was he directly and knowingly attacking God himself? Possibly both, but even apart from a conscious intention for the latter, the reality of the situation was that he was making common use of extremely holy objects, an attack on God himself.

Blasphemy is the act of dishonoring God through speech or actions, and Belshazzar does both here, by misusing objects associated with the worship of God and, in doing so, praising false gods (see next section on "Idolatry"). To be sure, it is not simply the fact that these goblets are holding alcohol, because the Bible is clear that there is nothing inherently evil about alcohol. But these goblets were only to be used in the worship of God, not for state banquets. Apparently even Nebuchadnezzar understood that. In essence, Belshazzar spit in the face of God.

(3) Idolatry. In regard to Belshazzar's blasphemous actions, we must remember that this Babylonian king would have acknowledged the existence and divine status of the Israelites' God. His action would not have been performed with a modern belief that the worship of God was a primitive superstition. No, Belshazzar would have acknowledged Yahweh as a legitimate deity, probably a minor deity of a minor and now disgraced people. But he also surely believed that his own native deities were much more powerful. After all, Babylonia had conquered Judah. Clearly Marduk, Sin, and the other chief Babylonian deities dominated Yahweh in the pantheon.

We see a similar attitude expressed by the Philistines during the childhood of Samuel. In 1 Samuel 4 we read about the Philistine defeat of the Israelite army under the leadership of Eli's two wicked sons, Hophni and Phinehas. These latter two men had thought to stem the military success of the Philistines by bringing the ark into the war camp. From their actions and speech, it is clear that they did not do this out of actual faith, but were treating the ark as a kind of magical box or relic.

As a result of their lack of faith, God allowed the Philistines to defeat the Israelites and capture the ark. It was now time for the Philistines to learn their lesson about the power of Yahweh. In 1 Samuel 5 the Philistines act like any other Near Eastern victor (including Nebuchadnezzar in Dan. 1) by taking the ark and placing it in the temple of their chief god, Dagon. This process acknowledges Yahweh's divine status while demonstrating his subservient position to Dagon.

The next day, however, the Philistines enter the temple to discover Dagon's statue fallen flat on its face before the ark. It is as if Dagon was worshiping Yahweh! They then hoist the idol back on its feet, but when they return the next day, Dagon has fallen again, this time with a broken head and hands (like a dismembered military casualty). Then after an outbreak of tumors on the people of Ashdod, they get the message and make plans to return the ark to Israel.

It is true that the ark of the covenant was a more potent symbol of God's presence and military might than the vessels, but it is also not clear whether the ark was in existence at the time of Nebuchadnezzar. In any case, the vessels of the temple were capable of serving as symbols of God's presence. Like the Philistines, Belshazzar too promoted his gods at the expense of the true God. He drank toasts to Marduk, Sin, and the others with the goblets reserved for the worship of the only true God. Belshazzar was indeed an idolater—following in the footsteps of his father, who was also an idolater (cf. Dan. 2 and 3).

The repetition of earlier sins does lead us to ask the question: Why is Belshazzar's fate different from that of Nebuchadnezzar? The episode, while not explicitly answering our question, does lead us to an answer as we read the gaps.

Judgment and repentance. We must understand the fate that differentiates Belshazzar in Daniel 5 from Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 4. Though a proud man and an idolater, Nebuchadnezzar fares well in the book of Daniel. He is treated with respect by the prophet, and though put in his place, survives to tell about it. Belshazzar, on the other hand, does not fare as well. Indeed, he suffers a humiliating defeat and dies at the hands of his enemies. When the hand begins writing on the wall, Belshazzar's fate is sealed. He is synonymous with God's sure and quick judgment in this book. He offends God; God sentences him. The prophet confronts him with God's sentence of death, and it is immediately carried out.

But what is the difference between Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar? Why does one live and one die? In the final analysis, the answer lies in the sovereign decision of God. Nebuchadnezzar offended God as deeply as Belshazzar, but the prophet was there rooting for him to turn back. When he did, God restored him. Daniel does not hold out hope for Belshazzar; he delivers an unconditional message of judgment. Thus, there is no repentance and no restoration.

In a word, here we have the interplay of divine sovereignty and human responsibility presented in such a way that we cannot easily sort them out. Surely, Belshazzar should have repented, but Daniel, speaking for God, does not give him a chance. Why? Were his sins, for some unexplainable reason, so much greater? Was the example of history, that is, the previous experience of Nebuchadnezzar, sufficient to leave Belshazzar without excuse? The latter has enough of a textual justification to lead us to further exploration.

Hearing the Word of God. Daniel's judgment speech begins with a reminiscence of Nebuchadnezzar (5:18–21). He was proud indeed, but when confronted by God, he acknowledged his subservience to him. In a word, he repented when confronted by God's word and action. In verse 22, Daniel turns his attention to Belshazzar by proclaiming, "But you his son, O Belshazzar, have not humbled yourself, though you knew all this." It is the last clause that is telling here—Belshazzar knew what he was supposed to do, but failed to do so. It was not as if this was all new to him.

To be honest, we do not know how Belshazzar knew these things. It could have been the talk of the court for decades afterward. Perhaps the queen mother had talked to him before about Daniel and his God. Whatever the means of communication, Daniel tells us that Belshazzar heard in such a way that he was fully responsible for his present rebellious actions. He had not heeded the warnings, and now he was doomed.

Please notice, however, that even this strong textual clue does not resolve the issue of the relationship between divine sovereignty and human responsibility. Nebuchadnezzar is described as having more than one conversion experience in the preceding chapters. He praises Yahweh at the end of chapter 3 only to find himself rebelling against God in chapter 4, but nonetheless getting a second chance, so to speak. Why does Nebuchadnezzar get a second chance whereas Belshazzar does not even get a first? Again, the ultimate answer is bound up with our understanding of God's sovereignty, as we will see in certain New Testament passages in the next section.

Contemporary Significance

"YOUR DAYS ARE numbered!"

"The handwriting is on the wall!"

These expressions are commonly used in twentieth-century English and are a modern legacy of Daniel 5. They both relate to what we have identified as the unique emphasis of the chapter, which is the awareness of the approach of certain judgment for one's offenses.

Of course, as used today, the expressions often express a belief, not in God, but in the certain hand of fate. Checking the bleak financial papers of a failing institution might elicit such a remark, or perhaps looking at the face of a terminally ill patient approaching the last few days of life. These sentences express the certainty of a bleak end.

In the Bible, of course, it is not fate that writes MENE MENE TEKEL PARSIN on the wall, it is God himself. Our story connects God with a gruesome judgment on a sinful individual. It raises the issue of God's judgment in one's life and beyond.

Where is the judgment of God? To what extent can we look at the failures and deaths of people around us today and say with confidence, "There is the judgment of God"? Does God judge people today as he judged Belshazzar in the story of Daniel 5?

The Germans are defeated in 1945 and Hitler kills himself in a bunker in Berlin. Is this the judgment of God? An atom bomb is dropped on Hiroshima. Is this the judgment of God? An epidemic rips through the gay community. Is this the judgment of God? An abortion clinic is bombed in Atlanta. Is this the judgment of God? A child molester is beaten up in New Jersey. Is this the judgment of God? A country singer's plane crashes off the coast of California. Is this the judgment of God? A Christian missionary dies in Pakistan at a young age. Surely this can't be the judgment of God, can it?

Is there a contrast between an Old Testament God of judgment and condemnation and a New Testament God of grace and mercy? By no means, the New Testament teaches that God, in Jesus, judges evil and condemns the wicked (John 8:26; 12:31). God is still judge in the New Testament (2 Tim. 4:8).²⁸

But there is also clear and strong teaching that God's followers are not in a position to judge others. Perhaps the most well-known teaching in this regard is found in Matthew 7:1–2: "Do not judge, or you too will be judged.

For in the same way you judge others, you will be judged, and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you." Paul echoes this understanding as he also emphasizes God's role as judge in Romans 2:1–4:

You, therefore, have no excuse, you who pass judgment on someone else, for at whatever point you judge the other, you are condemning yourself, because you who pass judgment do the same things. Now we know that God's judgment against those who do such things is based on truth. So when you, a mere man, pass judgment on them and yet do the same things, do you think you will escape God's judgment? Or do you show contempt for the riches of his kindness, tolerance and patience, not realizing that God's kindness leads you toward repentance?

God judges, indeed, but we cannot know with certainty when suffering and death is God's judgment and when it is not. Therefore, we must keep our mouths shut. We must never point to a person who suffers and say, "Behold God's judgment!"

What is the difference between Daniel and us, or for that matter between Daniel's condemnation of Belshazzar and the three friends' condemnation of Job? The difference is that Daniel was a recipient of divine revelation and as a result his words are not his own interpretation of the situation, but rather God's own words. Daniel is a mouthpiece for God's sentence on Belshazzar's life. No one today plays the same role as Daniel did in the Babylonian court. No one today has a direct pipeline to God's mind. Even Paul, in connection with the present status of the Jewish people, could state, "How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!" (Rom. 11:33).

As the book of Job teaches, not all suffering is the result of an individual's sin. That was the mistake made by his three friends. They knew that sin had its consequences and godly living had its consequences. Sin led to suffering and righteousness led to success in life. But they believed that that was the whole equation. Thus, if you observed a person suffering, that person must be under God's judgment for his or her sins. The reader knows better than any of the three friends. Because of the first two chapters, we know with certainty that Job was right in his assertions that he was innocent. He was not suffering for his sins.

Certainly the disciples of Jesus were quick to judge. As they looked at a blind man, they gave the knee-jerk reaction, "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents that he was born blind?" (John 9:2). Jesus responded, "Neither this man nor his parents sinned ... but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (v. 3).

The disciples' question seems so cruel today. How could they see God's judgment so automatically and dogmatically in this man's blindness? But are we any different today? How many look at a person infected with AIDS and don't even ask the question as they mutter quietly, "The judgment of God." Is this any less cruel or any less deserving of Christ's anger? AIDS is no more or less God's judgment for sins than cancer or the common cold. Of course, they are the result of sin. There would be no disease at all without it, but that a person has AIDS is not the special judgment of God for his or her sins, even if one contracted that disease through intravenous drug use or homosexual activity.

Our role is not to judge. Rather, it is to offer the good news of repentance and restoration. Daniel, a recipient of God's direct revelation, had the authority to withhold the good news of repentance and restoration from Belshazzar, but not so us. Today we do not say to anyone, "You are condemned; you are beyond God's mercy." If we do, we condemn ourselves, because our sin is no better than anyone else's from God's perspective. Note James 2:8–11:

If you really keep the royal law found in Scripture, "Love your neighbor as yourself," you are doing right. But if you show favoritism, you sin and are convicted by the law as lawbreakers. For whoever keeps the whole law and yet stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it. For he who said, "Do not commit adultery," also said, "Do not murder." If you do not commit adultery but do commit murder, you have become a lawbreaker.

If our role is not to judge, then what is it? The world is full of trouble, evil, chaos. What are we to do about it? We are to offer words of life, not condemnation. We are to play the role of Daniel before Nebuchadnezzar, not Daniel before Belshazzar.

Of course, Daniel before Nebuchadnezzar was not morally neutral. God did not direct him to let the king go along his own merry way of rebellion and arrogance. Daniel called him to task, but with a note of deep sadness at the suffering Nebuchadnezzar experienced as well as great hope of restoration.

Neither are we to be morally neutral as we live in a world of injustice, oppression, and licentiousness. We do not seek the destruction of godless people, rather, their redemption. After all, every one of us who today call ourselves Christians were without God. And even after becoming Christians, we still sin. We must never, ever condemn any other person without a full acknowledgment of the darkness of our own hearts and the destructive nature of many of our actions. We must take the log out of our own eyes before we can remove the speck from someone else's (Matt. 7:5).

Unfortunately, I would hazard to guess that the Christian community, in the Western world at least, would be characterized by the watching world as narrow, intolerant, judgmental, and self-righteous rather than forgiving, compassionate, gracious, and redemptive. All of us who call on the name of Christ must do some serious soul-searching and repenting as we reach out to transform the world in our Lord's name.

The sin of blasphemy. The world does need transformation. The arrogance, blasphemy, and idolatry that incarnated in the actions of Belshazzar can be found in abundance in our culture today. Previous chapters have given us the opportunity to describe contemporary manifestations of pride and idolatry, so we will use this section to speak briefly about blasphemy.

Above, we described blasphemy as an act of dishonoring God through speech or actions. Specifically we observed Belshazzar's committing blasphemy through the misuse of objects associated with the worship of God—drinking from the holy temple vessels.

Today, it is true, we have no equivalent to the holy temple vessels. In Old Testament times God chose to make his presence known in special ways in certain locations. These special places—like the tabernacle and the temple —were symbolic of the great gulf that exists between a holy God and a sinful humanity. It was not possible to gain easy access into the temple. The holy place was supervised by a consecrated people, the priests, and certain rites and rituals, notably sacrifices, had to be observed in order to gain entrance into the presence of God.

In a word, there was a sharp and definite division between the holy and the profane. The temple vessels were associated with a sacred place and therefore were part of the realm of the sacred. Their profane use was therefore an abomination.

What parallels do we have today? At first sight, there appears to be none. After all, with the coming of Christ the division between holy and profane is completely done away with. This fact was anticipated in Zechariah's prophecy in Zechariah 14:20–21:

On that day HOLY TO THE LORD will be inscribed on the bells of the horses, and the cooking pots in the LORD's house will be like the sacred bowls in front of the altar. Every pot in Jerusalem and Judah will be holy to the LORD Almighty, and all who come to sacrifice will take some of the pots and cook in them. And on that day there will no longer be a Canaanite in the house of the LORD Almighty.

Its fulfillment is vividly illustrated by the rending of the temple curtain that separated the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place (Matt. 27:51). Christ's death and resurrection, it appears, moves us into a new era. No longer is anything holy....

Or is it the other way around? Indeed, that is what the Zechariah passage indicates. It is not that there is nothing holy, but that everything is holy. This makes sense, does it not, as we consider the difference with the Old Testament era? Whereas before Christ God made his presence known in a special way in a certain location, today we can meet God anywhere—in a church, a street, a car, our homes, a bar.

Such an understanding intensifies the concept of blasphemy. Blasphemy is not just defacing a church or a cross. It is a misuse of any part of God's creation. An assault against a fellow human being is an act of blasphemy. After all, we are all created in the image of God (Gen. 1:27; James 3:9). An angry word spoken against a fellow believer is an act of blasphemy. After all, Christians are all temples of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16). The destruction of the environment for selfish purposes is an act of blasphemy. The land, the air, the seas are each the creation of our holy God.

Again, when we fully understand blasphemy, we are staggered by the extent to which each and every one of us is implicated. The implication, however, should not come as a surprise. Like Belshazzar we "know all this." Belshazzar knew from the example of his great predecessor Nebuchadnezzar. But where have we been told?

The world today is far better informed than in the days of Belshazzar. We have been warned and given clear directions about a proper relationship with God. God himself has given the people of the world a direct message through his Word.

This is a major component of the teaching of the parable of Lazarus and the rich man (Luke 16:19–31). The parable presents the plight of an unnamed rich man, suffering for his sins in hell. Lazarus, a beggar who suffered in life, was enjoying the afterlife in heaven. In response to the rich man's request, Abraham does not allow Lazarus to slake his thirst. The rich man's suffering incites him to beseech Abraham to allow Lazarus to go warn his still living brothers of the coming judgment. The ensuing interchange between Abraham and the rich man is revealing (Luke 16:29–31):

Abraham replied, "They have Moses and the Prophets; let them listen to them."

"No, father Abraham," he said, "but if someone from the dead goes to them, they will repent."

He said to him, "If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead."

The message to the rich man concerning his brothers is essentially the same as Daniel's to Belshazzar: "They should have known!" They have the Word of God at their fingertips. They need to read and respond. And, of course, the message of the parable goes beyond the rich man and his brothers to us today. We should know.... We have no excuse.

However, we do not have to look too far to see contemporary misuses of God's Word that look eerily similar to Belshazzar's profanation of the holy vessels. Not everyone who practices a postmodern approach to the Bible is guilty of profanation; indeed, Christian scholars need to think through the implications of postmodernism for reading the Bible.²⁹ Most exegesis, whether by evangelicals or others, simply operate with a modern-scientific worldview that is no more biblical than a postmodern one. However, it is wrong simply to assume the validity of the culture that we happen to live in without submitting it to a biblical critique.³⁰ Unfortunately, there are too many examples of the reverse, submitting the Bible to a postmodern critique.

One glaring example may be found in a recent interpretation of Psalm 24.31 This essay's purpose is to demonstrate an approach to the text as well as to discuss Psalm 24. The author proclaims the postmodern dictum that texts have no determinate meaning. There is no presence, divine or authorial, to rein in our interpretation. We, as readers, can ascribe whatever meaning we like to the text. He promotes the idea that biblical interpreters should simply cut the cloth of the text to fit the needs of the audience who is paying for our skills. Nonetheless, with a move that seems to fit uneasily with his idea that the text itself has no meaning, he argues that Psalm 24 presents a view of God and war that he finds repulsive and argues that we must read "against the grain" of the apparent meaning of this text. Belshazzar takes the holy vessels of God and mocks God by drinking and toasting his idols; is Clines's treatment of the Bible far removed from this act?

Daniel 6:1-28

¹IT PLEASED DARIUS to appoint 120 satraps to rule throughout the kingdom, ²with three administrators over them, one of whom was Daniel. The satraps were made accountable to them so that the king might not suffer loss. ³Now Daniel so distinguished himself among the administrators and the satraps by his exceptional qualities that the king planned to set him over the whole kingdom. ⁴At this, the administrators and the satraps tried to find grounds for charges against Daniel in his conduct of government affairs, but they were unable to do so. They could find no corruption in him, because he was trustworthy and neither corrupt nor negligent. ⁵Finally these men said, "We will never find any basis for charges against this man Daniel unless it has something to do with the law of his God."

⁶So the administrators and the satraps went as a group to the king and said: "O King Darius, live forever! ⁷The royal administrators, prefects, satraps, advisers and governors have all agreed that the king should issue an edict and enforce the decree that anyone who prays to any god or man during the next thirty days, except to you, O king, shall be thrown into the lions' den. ⁸Now, O king, issue the decree and put it in writing so that it cannot be altered—in accordance with the laws of the Medes and Persians, which cannot be repealed." ⁹So King Darius put the decree in writing.

¹⁰Now when Daniel learned that the decree had been published, he went home to his upstairs room where the windows opened toward Jerusalem. Three times a day he got down on his knees and prayed, giving thanks to his God, just as he had done before.

¹¹Then these men went as a group and found Daniel praying and asking God for help. ¹²So they went to the king and spoke to him about his royal decree: "Did you not publish a decree that during the next thirty days anyone who prays to any god or man except to you, O king, would be thrown into the lions' den?"

The king answered, "The decree stands—in accordance with the laws of the Medes and Persians, which cannot be repealed."

¹³Then they said to the king, "Daniel, who is one of the exiles from Judah, pays no attention to you, O king, or to the decree you put in writing. He still prays three times a day." ¹⁴When the king heard this, he was greatly distressed; he was determined to rescue Daniel and made every effort until sundown to save him.

¹⁵Then the men went as a group to the king and said to him, "Remember, O king, that according to the law of the Medes and Persians no decree or edict that the king issues can be changed."

¹⁶So the king gave the order, and they brought Daniel and threw him into the lions' den. The king said to Daniel, "May your God, whom you serve continually, rescue you!"

¹⁷A stone was brought and placed over the mouth of the den, and the king sealed it with his own signet ring and with the rings of his nobles, so that Daniel's situation might not be changed. ¹⁸Then the king returned to his palace and spent the night without eating and without any entertainment being brought to him. And he could not sleep.

¹⁹At the first light of dawn, the king got up and hurried to the lions' den. ²⁰When he came near the den, he called to Daniel in an anguished voice, "Daniel, servant of the living God, has your God, whom you serve continually, been able to rescue you from the lions?"

²¹Daniel answered, "O king, live forever! ²²My God sent his angel, and he shut the mouths of the lions. They have not hurt me, because I was found innocent in his sight. Nor have I ever done any wrong before you, O king."

²³The king was overjoyed and gave orders to lift Daniel out of the den. And when Daniel was lifted from the den, no wound was found on him, because he had trusted in his God.

²⁴At the king's command, the men who had falsely accused Daniel were brought in and thrown into the lions' den, along with their wives and children. And before they reached the floor of the den, the lions overpowered them and crushed all their bones.

²⁵Then King Darius wrote to all the peoples, nations and men of every language throughout the land:

"May you prosper greatly!

²⁶"I issue a decree that in every part of my kingdom people must fear and reverence the God of Daniel.

"For he is the living God and he endures forever; his kingdom will not be destroyed, his dominion will never end.

27He rescues and he saves; he performs signs and wonders in the heavens and on the earth. He has rescued Daniel from the power of the lions."

²⁸So Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

Original Meaning

DANIEL 6 BRINGS to a close the stories concerning Daniel's activities in the foreign court. He has not changed location; he is still in the city of Babylon. However, a new empire rules the roost as Persia has replaced Babylon. Belshazzar is dead and Darius the Mede is in control.

The identity of Darius the Mede is a vexing question. This commentary is not the place for an extended discussion, but we will present the problem in its broad outlines. In brief, Cyrus was the king of Persia at the time of the fall of Babylon. No Darius is mentioned in the tablets from this time period. We begin by reminding the reader of the situation just a century ago with Belshazzar. At that time, no figure named Belshazzar was associated with the end of Babylonian history. Now, however, he is a well-documented person (see comments on ch. 5).

Darius is a well-known Persian royal name but not until long after the death of Cyrus and the rule of Cyrus's son Cambyses. Darius I (522–486 B.C.) was the king who instituted a system whereby his far-flung empire was ruled by twenty satraps. Because Darius I is associated with the institution of a new system of satrapies, many scholars feel that Daniel, writing later (see Introduction), confused Darius I with the conqueror of Babylon. However, this type of confusion seems extraordinary even at a remove of several centuries. It is more likely that Darius is a throne name for someone ruling in Babylon at the behest of Cyrus.

Recent scholars have attempted to associate Darius the Mede with particular individuals whom we know played important roles at the time Persia incorporated Babylon into its empire. J. Whitcomb has argued that Darius the Mede is actually Gubaru, known from the Akkadian texts as governor of Babylon.² The eminent Assyriologist D. J. Wiseman, on the other hand, has argued that Darius the Mede is the Babylonian throne name of none other than Cyrus himself.³ Perhaps the most persuasive of all attempts at identification is that of W. Shea: Darius the Mede is Gu/Ugbaru, the general to whom the Nabonidus Chronicle attributes the conquest of Babylon.⁴ He would be ruling as a sub-king at the whim of the ultimate ruler, Cyrus himself.

Short of a document identifying one of these figures as Darius, we cannot be certain. The identification of Darius the Mede is an important problem for those of us who believe that Daniel gives us accurate historical information, but it does not affect our interpretation. Harmonizations are possible, as we have seen from the suggestions of Whitcomb, Wiseman, and Shea, but not provable. With this brief explanation for those who are troubled by the issue, we pass on now to a consideration of the content of the passage.

The story is easily identified as a court narrative of conflict.⁵ The plot is propelled by the jealousy that Daniel's peers and subordinates in the Persian government feel toward his rapid rise to the top of the political hierarchy. They seek to undermine his position by pitting his loyalty to God over against his loyalty to the Persian government, which he serves. Boogaart is correct to see the conflict ultimately as one between two empires:

On the one hand we have Darius, ruler of all the peoples, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth (cf. verse 25) and enforcer of the law of the Medes and Persians. On the other hand we have the God of Daniel, working signs and wonders in heaven and on earth (cf. verse 27) and enforcer of Jewish law (cf. verse 5). The kingdoms overlap and the question of sovereignty has to be resolved.⁶

As the chapter explores this conflict, it again emphasizes the overarching theme of the whole book: In spite of present appearances God is in control. God will be victorious over the seemingly powerful forces ranged against him and his people. Thus, this story, like those that preceded it, provides comfort for God's people, who find themselves in situations that seem beyond their control.

Daniel 6 finds its closest parallel with Daniel 3. Notice, though, a subtle difference that makes Daniel 6 more than a mere repetition. While the story of the three friends of Daniel in the fiery furnace shows how the faithful refuse to participate in idolatrous religious practices, the present chapter shows how they refuse to refrain from proper worship of God. Daniel is told not to pray to Yahweh, but he does so nonetheless. Daniel obeys God's law, not the immutable law of the Medes and Persians.

The chapter may be divided into four parts: (1) the plot against Daniel (6:1–9); (2) the trap and reluctant punishment (6:10–18); (3) Daniel's rescue and the accusers' demise (6:19–24); (4) Darius's decree (6:25–28).

The Plot Against Daniel (6:1–9)

THE STORY OPENS with the new king setting up his personal form of government for Babylonia. Over him is Cyrus, the king of Persia, so we are to understand this story as concerned only with Babylonia. While it is true that at a later date Darius will divide the entire empire into twenty satrapies, the present division involved much smaller units. Darius thus pushes the governance of Babylonia in the direction of decentralization, which may help explain his later quick acceptance of the proposal to make him the chief mediator of prayer. In other words, this suggestion assures him of his continued central place in the government while at the same time delegating authority to others.

By now, we are not surprised that Daniel distinguishes himself from all the other authorities whom Darius has placed in important positions throughout his kingdom. After all, we already know he is the wisest of the wise and the most capable of everyone in the land. The king's intention to promote him above everyone else is apparently leaked to the others, who for obviously selfish reasons want to block his swift rise. Unfortunately for them, Daniel's behavior conforms to his spotless reputation. They will have to manufacture a fault in his personality.

Their twisted minds come up with the ideal plan. They know that Daniel's religion is the fundamental guiding principle of his life. He would betray the king before he would betray his religion. Thus they lay their trap to trip him up.

Their approach to the king is a masterpiece of political deception to achieve their illicit ends. The Aramaic verb (rgs) behind the NIV translation "went as a group" (v. 6) is ambiguous as to their attitude. As Fewell explains, the word has a semantic range that moves from "the rather innocent connotation of 'in company,' to the idea of 'conspiracy,' to the notion of 'rage." She rightly believes that all senses of the word echo in the context. She also describes how this verb's combination with the preposition 'al can also be interpreted in different senses from the point of view of the king himself, who thinks they are making a fuss "over" him, or from the vantage point of the conspirators themselves, who are actually working "against" him.¹⁰

In any case, these "administrators and satraps" are clearly lying to the king, since they claim that the proposal they are presenting has been unanimously approved by all of his subordinates. Of course, Daniel, the king's favorite, does not even know about it.

The proposal itself is strange. It definitely appeals to the vanity of the king, especially if the king is feeling any insecurity about his popularity or power. Perhaps this explains his ready acceptance of such a bizarre suggestion. On the surface, it appears to suggest to the king that he be sole deity of the realm for thirty days. While it is easy to imagine someone's overweening pride allowing him to believe he is a god, it is hard to see someone putting such a short time period on his divinity.

Questions like this have led John Walton to make the plausible suggestion that the decree does not actually "deify the king but designates him as the only legitimate representative of deity for the stated time." Whichever it is, Daniel will find himself in an impossible situation from a human point of view, for the decree may not be repealed according to the custom of the Persians and Medes. 12

The Trap and Reluctant Punishment (6:10–18)

THE NARRATIVE NOW shifts scene. We move from the court to Daniel's home where he hears of the king's decree to forbid prayer toward anything or anyone but the king himself. His response is simple: He goes upstairs and prays with the windows open toward Jerusalem. There is no speech or inner turmoil recorded in the narrative. The impression the narrative intends to impart is Daniel's unflinching obedience. He does not question, doubt, or worry; he acts. He does not bow toward Darius, but toward Jerusalem. Darius is neither the object nor the mediator of his prayers. That role is taken by Yahweh.

Why does Daniel bow toward Jerusalem? Essentially, his act is motivated by 1 Kings 8:35–36 (italics added):

When the heavens are shut up and there is no rain because your people have sinned against you, and when they pray toward this place and confess your name and turn from their sin because you have afflicted them, then hear from heaven and forgive the sin of your servants, your people Israel. Teach them the right way to live, and send rain on the land you gave your people for an inheritance.

The context of these verses is Solomon's prayer of dedication of the temple in Jerusalem. God had made his presence known in a special way in the temple. As Solomon made clear, the temple did not contain God, but was the place God himself chose as the place where his people would come to worship him.

Of course, at the time of Daniel's prayer the temple was in ruins. God had abandoned his earthly home (Ezek. 9–11) because of the presumption of the people (Jer. 7) and had allowed the Babylonians to tear down the temple (book of Lamentations). Nonetheless, Judeans in exile, such as Daniel, turned regularly to the city with longing in their hearts and hope for the future.

According to the passage, Daniel did this three times a day. This practice is not mandated anywhere in Scripture, but is perhaps suggested by passages such as Psalm 55:17:¹³

Evening, morning and noon I cry out in distress, and he hears my voice.

The mention of the "three times a day" indicates that Daniel's prayer on this occasion is not stirred on by the decree; it is part of his regular habit. He is not flaunting his rebellion in the face of the king's orders; it is business as usual. Indeed, the description of his prayer is a statement that he is neither flaunting nor hiding his religious practice. After all, he is praying in an upper room, and with the windows open. He is not on public display, but neither is he hiding from determined spies.

And determined spies there were. The officials who precipitated the crisis see Daniel's actions and report them to the king (vv. 12, 15). As we have seen above (cf. comments on v. 6), the verb used is rgs, indicating not only that they act as a group but also with malicious intent. From their description, we learn something of the content of Daniel's prayer. He is "asking God for help" (v. 11). Likely, he is turning to God for aid because he anticipates trouble from the decree. As the story continues, we discover how God answers his prayer.

The conspirators present news of Daniel's actions craftily. They know where the king's sympathies lie, so before they accuse Daniel, they remind the king of his earlier decision and its binding character. They then confront the king with the news that indicts Daniel.

The king reacts with extreme dismay. The contrast with Nebuchadnezzar's reaction to the three friends in Daniel 3 could not be stronger. While the latter responded with increasing anger to the friends' refusal to participate in the pagan rite, Darius wants to save the aged Judean counselor. However, he is trapped by his own unchangeable words and must carry out the punishment.

"So the king gave the order" (v. 16). As decreed, Daniel is thrown into the lions' den. No comparable form of punishment is known from the ancient Near East, but then powerful yet insecure nations from time immemorial have devised tortures and deaths with incredible imagination. The conception is simple enough: Develop a pit and put lions in it. The victim, in this case Daniel, could be thrown in; a stone blocked the point of entry, and the lions would be allowed to do their work. Since the punishment in this case is the execution of a royal decree, the king seals the entrance with his seal. This act does not lock the door as much as prevent tampering with it. If someone were to open the door before the next morning, it would be noticed because the seal would be broken.

The king's concern for Daniel continues through the night. He cannot eat or sleep. As he discovers the next morning to his surprise, his evening has been much more difficult than Daniel's!

Daniel's Rescue and the Accusers' Demise (6:19–24)

THE COMING DAWN finds Darius rushing to the lions' den in order to discover the fate of Daniel. Contrary to some interpreters, ¹⁴ Darius must have had at least a glimmer of hope that Daniel would survive the night.

After all, he had commended Daniel into the hands of the prophet's God and called out to him the moment he reached the den.

Perhaps it is best to consider the lions' den a trial by ordeal rather than an execution per se. An execution, after all, would not have a time limit. The understanding of the scene as an ordeal also explains some of the language found in the chapter. What was an ordeal? An individual was subjected to an ordeal when he was suspected of a crime, but there was some uncertainty as to his guilt. Daniel's guilt in relationship to Darius's decree appears clear, but as he emerges from the den, he claims that the lions have not hurt him "because I was found innocent in [God's] sight. Nor have I ever done any wrong before you, O king" (v. 22). Daniel's survival attests to his innocence.

Ordeals are broadly known in the ancient Near East.¹⁵ They take many forms, but perhaps the most well known is the water ordeal. An individual suspected of a crime is thrown into a river. If he or she dies, they are guilty. But if they survive, they are innocent and set free. Biblical law contains only one possible instance of ordeal: the case of a woman suspected of adultery (Num. 5:11–31).¹⁶

The theology behind an ordeal is that God, who knows the heart in a way that human judges do not, will see the verdict through. Daniel's survival, then, is God's judgment of innocence on Daniel. In this judgment, Darius rejoices.

Daniel further attests to God's involvement in his survival when he informs Darius that during the night God sent his angel to shut the mouths of the lions. The angel plays the same role as the "fourth man" in the blazing furnace in Daniel 3. Furthermore, just as the three friends do not even have the smell of smoke on their clothes as they are brought out of the furnace, so Daniel doesn't have a scratch on his body when he is lifted out of the den, even though he spent the night with lions.

But perhaps the lions weren't hungry that night. Or perhaps someone sympathetic to Daniel, say Darius, had had the lions fed to the full or even drugged beforehand. Any such doubts are dispelled in the following verses when Daniel's accusers and their families are thrown into the den. The viciousness and hunger of the lions are vividly displayed by the fact they were attacked and killed before "they reached the floor of the den" (v. 24).

The accusers set a trap for Daniel, but in the end they were caught in their own trap—and not only the accusers themselves, but also their families. Modern commentators, for obvious reasons, have felt uncomfortable imagining the prophet standing by as wives and children are thrown into the den. Moreover, even though it was the Persian king's decision (after all, those children might well grow up with ideas of revenge in mind), the narrator seems to have taken some pleasure in the scene. We must remember, however, that this scene is presented to a generation of God's people who felt helpless in the grips of their oppressors. Their own families were impotent in the face of exploitation and worse. They were daily being manipulated for purposes other than their own.

Darius's Decree (6:25–28)

THE PLOT OF Daniel 6 was set in motion by Darius's issuing a decree that prayers could only be directed toward himself either as a divine figure or, as is more likely, the only mediator with the divine realm. The chapter ends with a second decree, this time promoting Daniel's God throughout his vast empire.

Has the thirty-day period of the first decree passed? If not, how could that unchangeable law be changed and replaced with this one? We cannot answer that question with certainty since we do not know the timing. In any case, God takes the place of Darius, at Darius's own urging, at the end of the chapter. What a wonderful testimony to the people of God that God truly is in control in spite of present appearances!

Darius proclaims the God of Daniel "the living God." This indicates that he not only exists, but is active in the world. Certainly the prophet's rescue shows that in a dramatic fashion. God and his kingdom will never end, and he rescues his people in astounding ways. Specifically, his rescue of Daniel from the lions' den demonstrates that "he rescues and he saves" (v. 27).

After Darius's speech, the chapter, which brings to a close the court narrative part of the book, concludes with the narrative statement that "Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus the Persian" (v. 28). Indeed he did. He prospered throughout his entire lifetime in the court. Fewell summarizes his progression well:

We have seen the Hebrew sage climb the political ladder from captive prisoner to initiate to sage (ch. 1) to chief sage (ch. 2) to administrator over the province of Babylon (chs. 2–3) to the king's personal adviser (ch. 4) to third ruler in the kingdom (ch. 5) to the prime minister that the king himself intends, at the beginning of ch. 6, to set over the entire kingdom and does implicitly set over the kingdom at the end of ch. 6.¹⁷

Though the story of Daniel's political career thus draws to a close, even more exciting material follows in the second half of the book.

Bridging Contexts

Daniel 6 is the last of six historical narratives featuring Daniel in a foreign court. Thus, we have already had ample opportunity to spell out the hermeneutical principles that allow us to move from the original context of the story to a contemporary setting. We have argued as early as chapter 1¹⁸ that the historical narrative of the Old Testament was written not simply for remembrance, but also to serve as a paradigm for future behavior. The narratives of Daniel, in particular, are shaped to serve as life examples for later generations of God's people.

We have also confronted the issue of bringing this Old Testament text to bear on a New Testament audience. Acknowledging Christ's climactic role in the history of God's story of redemption leads modern interpreters to recognize the possibility of discontinuity as well as continuity between ourselves and the ancient audience. We have also seen how Jesus himself instructed his followers to read the Old Testament in the light of his coming (Luke 24:25–27, 44). We will keep these principles in mind as we work through the contents of Daniel 6.

Basic truths repeated. Although I do not want to be overly repetitive, I must nonetheless point out that Daniel 6, like the preceding five chapters, illustrates the basic themes of the book of Daniel. Despite present appearances, God is indeed in control. Regardless of the fact that powerful political forces move against Daniel, God preserves him from their clutches. In spite of the fact that the law of the Medes and Persians has condemned him to death, God preserves his life. Regardless of the fact that the lions are hungry, God does not allow them to even scratch Daniel's skin. God indeed is in control!

But Daniel not only survives in spite of his faith; he prospers. At the beginning of the chapter, he already has a position of great importance in Darius's court. The plot against him was motivated by the other leaders' jealousy of his power. As the chapter ends, the narrator drives this point home with the comment: "So Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus the Persian" (6:28). What an example and encouragement to God's people, who later faced similar threats and challenges! The basic message of this chapter to later readers is simple: "Remain faithful! God will take care of you."

Of course, the threats and obstacles in life can be incredibly imposing. Daniel and his three friends have already testified to that truth. In Daniel 6, we have a story where the faith of Daniel alone is tested. In many ways, this chapter parallels Daniel 3, which recorded the depth of the three friends' faith, with no mention of Daniel. Here we have Daniel without the three friends. The text does not allow us any basis to speculate concerning the whereabouts or actions of the three friends here, any more than we could be certain about Daniel's absence from the earlier story.

The conflict of laws. The focus on Daniel, of course, results from the fact that he has drawn the envy of his colleagues because of his meteoric rise in Darius's estimation. They cannot find anything in his behavior or character to use in order to undermine his position, so they resort to framing him. They manipulate the king to create a law that they know Daniel will not keep. The law prohibits prayer to any god or human except Darius himself for a period of thirty days. Whether the law sets Darius on a divine pedestal or imagines him to be the conduit to the gods is irrelevant; in either case, the surface intention of the law is to create a means by which extreme loyalty to the king can be measured. The irony of the situation is that the administrators who urged the king to create this law were actually disloyal to Darius, working against his own desires and intentions, whereas Daniel, who finds himself under judgment of the law, is actually the most true of his subordinates.

Nonetheless, the law created by Darius became one of the "laws of the Medes and Persians, which cannot be repealed" (v. 8). The irony here is that the law cannot even be repealed by the king himself! A law that has as its ostensible purpose the intention to set the king up as an ultimate authority actually imprisons him to its own authority.

Even more significantly, it brings the king and his law into a fundamental conflict with God and his law. Daniel knows that God's law requires that he pray to the ultimate authority of the universe, not to a human king. The basic tension in Daniel 6 is the conflict between God's law and the law of the Medes and Persians. Daniel must choose between the two laws, and he does not hesitate for a moment. He chooses to obey God's law.

Before continuing, we should note the difference between God's relationship with his law and Darius's relationship with his. The law in both cases reflects the will and desires of the one who creates the law. Darius's law reflects what he wants, and God's law reflects what God wants. We have seen, however, that Darius's law ultimately binds him to a course of action he did not want. When he saw the consequences of his actions, he would have loved to change his mind, but he could not. He was not above the law.

Is God above his law? This is a difficult question. In one sense, we want to say, yes. God is above everything. He is not bound by his own laws. He can do whatever he wants. However, to go down that road is misleading and wrong. As opposed to Darius's relationship to the law he creates, God's law is always the perfect expression of his character. The difference between Darius and God is that the latter knows himself perfectly and knows the consequences of his acts and pronouncements perfectly. This is why the psalmist in Psalm 19:7–11 can speak of God's law in a way that would be illegitimate about any human law:

The law of the LORD is perfect, reviving the soul.

The statutes of the LORD are trustworthy, making wise the simple.

The precepts of the LORD are right, giving joy to the heart.

The commands of the LORD are radiant, giving light to the eyes.

The fear of the LORD is pure, enduring forever.

The ordinances of the LORD are sure and altogether righteous.

They are more precious than gold, than much pure gold; they are sweeter than honey, than honey from the comb.

By them is your servant warned; in keeping them there is great reward.

The cost of discipleship. Daniel kept the law of the Lord, but at first it did not seem like reward would be the result of his obedience. Darius, bound by his own law, threw him into the lions' den. Daniel's obedience flowed from his realization that he would sin if he did not practice his own religion. In this way, it is the flip side of Daniel 3, where the three friends illustrated the realization that they would sin if they participated in the false religious practices of their idolatrous oppressors. The two chapters together thus encourage later readers to avoid false religion and to pursue legitimate religion, no matter what the cost.

And the cost was great. Daniel does not articulate it as blatantly as the three friends in their speech before Nebuchadnezzar, but we are surely to understand Daniel's attitude to affirm the belief that "the God we serve is able to save us from it [the death penalty], and he will rescue us from your hand, O king. But even if he does not, we want you to know, O king, that we will not serve your gods ..." (3:17–18; or in the case of Daniel, he will not desist from worshiping his God). In a word, Daniel would rather be eaten by lions than stop praying to God.

Even so, notice the quiet faithfulness of Daniel. Here we revisit a theme encountered for the first time in chapter 1. Daniel does not grandstand for the faith, but neither does he try to hide his love of the Lord. He did not go to the public square or the court to flaunt his rejection of Darius's decree; rather, he went as usual to his "upstairs room" (v. 10). Yet he did not close the windows so no one could observe his prayers. It may take some effort, like that exerted by the conspirators, but Daniel was not taking any extraordinary measures to hide his lack of compliance to Darius's decree.

No, he will obey the law of God, not the law of the Medes and Persians with which it conflicts.

For his obedience, he is condemned to the lions' den. Again, Darius's law no longer reflects the king's will, but he has no other choice. In the world in which he lives and helped to create, not even the king can circumvent the law. He can hope, but he cannot stop the wheels that he set in motion.

God's redemptive power. In other words, Darius, the most powerful human being in the world, has no power to save Daniel. But Daniel's faith is founded on a person who is more powerful than the king, God himself. As events unfold, we observe another important biblical theme in operation: God overrules the evil intentions of human beings to bring about great salvation.

God is not only not bound by his own law as Darius is; he can deliver his people from the evil intentions of their enemies. We have seen this important redemptive principle at work frequently in previous Scripture, but I will only use one story to illustrate it. In previous chapters we had occasion to note similarities between Daniel and Joseph. As we read the Joseph story with this principle in mind, we see again and again how God delivered him from the evil intentions of human beings. Jealous brothers wanted him dead, so they threw him in a pit. God saved Joseph from death at that point when they saw an opportunity to turn their rage into a commercial venture by selling him into slavery to the Midianites. He ended up in Egypt, where he distinguished himself in the service of the high Egyptian official Potiphar.

There, however, he eventually ran into trouble because of the evil intentions of Potiphar's wife, who framed him for attempted rape. Joseph ended up in jail. This is where he met two other high Egyptian officials, the chief baker and the chief cupbearer, whose acquaintance ultimately brought him into contact with the pharaoh himself. His new high office placed him in a position from which he could save his family from certain death by starvation during an intense famine.

Joseph's was no ordinary family. It was the seed of the promise, the promise given to Abraham in Genesis 12:1–3. Joseph himself articulated the principle we are applying to the story in Daniel 6. After the death of Jacob, Joseph's brothers thought the time of their punishment for mistreating their now powerful brother had come. In response to their pleas for mercy, however, Joseph expressed his certainty concerning God's purposes in his suffering over the years: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:20).

In this story in Daniel, God overruled the evil intentions of the conspirators and the powerlessness of Darius in order to illustrate to countless generations of his people that he is able to save his people in the midst of the most dire circumstances. We must ask what we face that surpasses the danger Daniel faced. Moreover, as we will see, we have a much stronger basis for faith in the midst of suffering and the threat of death than Daniel did.

To take it one step further, just as God saves, he also judges. Daniel lived through the night with the hungry lions. But the next morning the conspirators meet the fate they had planned for Daniel. The lions weren't sleepy or full during the night, for the bodies of the enemies of God's people did not even hit the ground before they were gobbled up. Daniel 6 thus illustrates the principle expressed in Proverbs 28:10:20

He who leads the upright along an evil path will fall into his own trap, but the blameless will receive a good inheritance.

Thus, Daniel 6 ends with Daniel alive and promoted and his enemies dead. To cap it all off, Darius celebrates Daniel's rescue by giving praise to an authority and a kingdom greater than his own. His decree in verses 26–27 is an implicit admission that his own power is limited, while the "living God" and his kingdom is above all.

Contemporary Significance

IN DANIEL 6, God calls his followers to persist in faithfulness in spite of opposition and the threat of death. He shows himself able to take care of his people in the most dire of circumstances. Daniel, his faithful servant, not only survives the lion ordeal, but he prospers to the end in the foreign court. Hebrews 11:33–34 alludes to this episode as a prime example of faith and its results. Today, Daniel is presented to us as an example of faith under duress.

Further, though Daniel 6 is not cited, surely our chapter helped provide justification for the behavior of Peter and the other apostles in Acts 5. They had just been imprisoned on the charge of preaching the gospel in Jerusalem. What do they do immediately upon their release? They preach again. When confronted, they respond, "We must obey God rather than men!" (Acts 5:29). Whether it is the law of God versus the law of the Medes and Persians, or versus the law of the Sanhedrin—or the law of the Romans, or the laws of the United States of America—God's faithful followers must always side with God's law.

Americans and most other Western Christians are spoiled, however. The democracies in which we live allow considerable room for the free exercise of religion. We may openly go to church, form our own schools, raise our children in our beliefs. If our religious conscience compels us, we can plead our case for noninvolvement in the military. We can openly protest trends in our society that are opposed to our religious values.

Private versus public situations. At times, however, Western Christians misapply the examples of Daniel and Peter. A prime example is the complaint about the lack of prayer in our public schools. Our present law prohibits a teacher from offering a prayer in our state-run schools. This bothers some Christians, who believe that Daniel 6 provides the motivation for objection. They argue that Daniel was told he could not pray, but he persisted in prayer. If we, then, are told we cannot pray, we must not cave in to the "law of the Medes and Persians." A similar kind of argument is presented in the analogous cases of Christmas displays on government property or the hanging of the Ten Commandments in a judge's courtroom.

But are these situations really analogous to Daniel 6? I suggest they are not. Daniel was not prohibited from praying in a certain location like the court; he was forbidden to pray to God at all, even in private! Indeed, it is preposterous to even imagine Daniel during his early years in Babylon insisting on prayer before the opening of his Akkadian class or the class on divination.

The confusion in the United States and probably other Western democracies arises because some Christians insist that their country is the modern equivalent of Israel. However, it cannot be urged too strongly that there are and can be no modern equivalents of Israel. There is no such thing as a "Christian nation," except in the sense of a nation where most of the inhabitants happen to be Christian at that particular historical moment.

In other words, the nation is not the church. The modern equivalent of Israel is not a political entity but rather the church. Christians should be working to keep prayer out of public schools, manger scenes off the front yard of city hall, and the Ten Commandments out of the local magistrates' offices. When the church has state backing, it grows complacent, or even worse, coercive in its witness. Indeed, study has shown that when the church gets an entrée into the power structures of the state (whether the government per se or public educational institutions), it has hurt, not helped, the cause of the kingdom. I believe we can see this in a country like Korea, where the church exercises enormous influence on the public sector and also has significant wealth and power. The power struggles within Korean ecclesiastical structures are notorious. No, the quiet faithfulness of Daniel in the privacy of his upper room has nothing to do with trying to practice public prayer in a state-run institution.

The modern parallels to Daniel 6 in Western democracies take place not in the arena of culture wars, but rather in more local situations. A librarian is fired because she refuses to work on a Sunday morning during worship services. A young teenager is told by his parents that he may not meet with the neighborhood church's youth group for prayer because they do not want him involved in "all that superstition." A wife is told that she can be a Christian, but must not act like it around the house. Where we today most often encounter conflict analogous to Daniel 6 is the law of God versus the law of an employer, a parent, a spouse.

Preparation and vigilance. Western Christians, however, must be vigilant. Their present freedom of religion could change over time. To be vigilant, however, does not mean to prepare for war or to fight for our rights. Again, the example of Daniel 6, as well as that of the disciples in the New Testament, not to speak of Jesus himself, is to prepare to risk all, even our lives. When Daniel heard about the law forbidding his prayer, he did not rally the troops for a strike or armed resistance, he prepared himself for death. The same may be said concerning the three friends in Daniel 3. Christians do not fight for their beliefs by assaulting or killing, but by dying.

The principle for this attitude comes from the Bible. We get stirring examples of this principle as it is worked on in the lives of Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, Peter, and many others in the pages of Scripture. But we also see examples today in the lives and deaths of our brothers and sisters who live in more coercive societies. Let me share with you the story of one of my students and his wife, Bob and Heidi Fu.

When Bob was a non-Christian, he was a leader in the protest in Tiananmen Square, which resulted in a massacre on June 4, 1989. After the protest, he became the object of intense scrutiny by the Public Security Bureau Police, but what really devastated him were betrayals by several of his colleagues. In his own words, Bob said he felt like "there was no hope, no future."

At this critical juncture in his life, one of his fellow students passed him the biography of Mr. Xi Xiong Mo, a former drug addict who converted to Christianity. Bob and his wife became Christians in that fateful year of 1989. God used them and others so that a number of his fellow students became Christians as well. Bob soon found he was again the object of the attention of the Communist Party, but now for a different reason—his Christian faith and ministry. He and his wife were both arrested in 1996 and spent two months in a Chinese jail, where they were viciously interrogated and lived in horrible conditions, but their faith grew strong.

They were suddenly released from prison, but told they could be reincarcerated at any time. Bob speculates they were released in order to see who else was in their movement. Around the same time, Heidi got pregnant without obtaining the necessary quota approval slip from the police. Rearrest and forced abortion were a real possibility in her life, so they fled from Beijing to Hong Kong and finally, after being interviewed on ABC World News Tonight, got the attention of influential people in the United States, resulting in permission to seek asylum here.²¹

Where did Daniel find the courage to face the lions' den? His courage came from his faith in "the living God." As we saw in the previous section, this God is a God who can overrule evil to bring about good, to bring salvation. Where did Bob and Heidi Fu and countless other Christians who have faced imprisonment and death for their faith find courage to persevere? They, and we, have an even stronger basis for our faith than Daniel. Why? Because since the time of Daniel, the hope of Israel has come. Jesus Christ himself has fulfilled the prophetic anticipation of a suffering and raised Savior. The Messiah is no longer a hope for the future, but a hope based on a past event. We do not look forward to the incarnation of God's Son, but we look back to the cross.

As we look back to the cross, we see that Jesus himself faced the same threat as Daniel in the lions' den. As early Christian art attests,²² Daniel's emergence from the lions' den is typological of Jesus death and resurrection. Towner and Goldingay explain the comparison most clearly among modern commentators.²³ As Daniel was framed on a false charge by the Persian administrators, so Jesus was framed by the jealous religious leaders of his day. They reported to the Roman authorities that he was claiming political authority with the title "king of the Jews" (Matt. 27:11). Jesus, like Daniel, was arrested while at prayer in a private location, the Garden of Gethsemane. Pilate, like Darius, worked for his release. But in the end, both Daniel and Jesus are turned over to be executed. As Towner emphasizes, however, the big difference between the two is that Daniel emerges without a scratch, while Jesus dies. Yet that difference is what underlines the superiority of the reality to its foreshadow. Jesus dies, yet he emerges from the tomb!

We have noted how Daniel in the lions' den demonstrates God's ability to overrule the evil intentions of men and women in order to bring about something good. With Joseph, we observed that God overruled the evil intentions of those who persecuted him to bring about salvation. Peter understands the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ as the ultimate fulfillment of this principle when he preaches at Pentecost (Acts 2:22–24):

Men of Israel, listen to this: Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him, as you yourselves know. This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross. But God raised him from the dead, freeing him from the agony of death, because it was impossible for death to keep its hold on him.

Now we can see the power that allows us to risk all for our faith. Jesus has not only gone into the lions' den and emerged unscathed, but he has died and been raised again. And, as Paul reminds us, his death and resurrection are the "firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor. 15:20). Because of Jesus, death cannot hold us either. "Death has been swallowed up in victory. Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting? The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (15:54–56).

Our faith gives us the courage to risk all, even death. Christians living in the West have not been tested to risk all. Often we act as if we are unwilling to risk anything. We need to pray for our brothers and sisters who today risk much, and we must ask the Lord to make us ready when our day of testing comes.

Our willingness to risk even our lives is what will turn the heads of the secular culture that surrounds us. Our complaints, our legislative efforts, our attempts to compel people to live according to our standards of morality will only close their ears. The power of quiet faithfulness is impressed upon us in the closing words of Darius in Dan. 6:26–27:

For he is the living God and he endures forever;
his kingdom will not be destroyed,
his dominion will never end.
He rescues and he saves;
he performs signs and wonders in the heavens and on the earth.
He has rescued Daniel from the power of the lions.

Daniel 7:1-28

¹In the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had a dream, and visions passed through his mind as he was lying on his bed. He wrote down the substance of his dream.

²Daniel said: "In my vision at night I looked, and there before me were the four winds of heaven churning up the great sea. ³Four great beasts, each different from the others, came up out of the sea.

4"The first was like a lion, and it had the wings of an eagle. I watched until its wings were torn off and it was lifted from the ground so that it stood on two feet like a man, and the heart of a man was given to it.

5"And there before me was a second beast, which looked like a bear. It was raised up on one of its sides, and it had three ribs in its mouth between its teeth. It was told, 'Get up and eat your fill of flesh!'

6"After that, I looked, and there before me was another beast, one that looked like a leopard. And on its back it had four wings like those of a bird. This beast had four heads, and it was given authority to rule.

⁷"After that, in my vision at night I looked, and there before me was a fourth beast—terrifying and frightening and very powerful. It had large iron teeth; it crushed and devoured its victims and trampled underfoot whatever was left. It was different from all the former beasts, and it had ten horns.

8"While I was thinking about the horns, there before me was another horn, a little one, which came up among them; and three of the first horns were uprooted before it. This horn had eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth that spoke boastfully.

⁹"As I looked,

"thrones were set in place, and the Ancient of Days took his seat. His clothing was as white as snow; the hair of his head was white like wool.

His throne was flaming with fire, and its wheels were all ablaze.

¹⁰A river of fire was flowing, coming out from before him.

Thousands upon thousands attended him; ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him.

The court was seated, and the books were opened.

¹¹"Then I continued to watch because of the boastful words the horn was speaking. I kept looking until the beast was slain and its body destroyed and thrown into the blazing fire. ¹²(The other beasts had been stripped of their authority, but were allowed to live for a period of time.)

13"In my vision at night I looked, and there before me was one like a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven. He approached the Ancient of Days and was led into his presence. ¹⁴He was given authority, glory and sovereign power; all peoples, nations and men of every language worshiped him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed.

¹⁵"I, Daniel, was troubled in spirit, and the visions that passed through my mind disturbed me. ¹⁶I approached one of those standing there and asked him the true meaning of all this.

"So he told me and gave me the interpretation of these things: ¹⁷ The four great beasts are four kingdoms that will rise from the earth. ¹⁸But the saints of the Most High will receive the kingdom and will possess it forever—yes, for ever and ever.'

1944 Then I wanted to know the true meaning of the fourth beast, which was different from all the others and most terrifying, with its iron teeth and bronze claws—the beast that crushed and devoured its victims and trampled underfoot whatever was left.

20 I also wanted to know about the ten horns on its head and about the other horn that came up, before which three of them fell—the horn that looked more imposing than the others and that had eyes and a mouth that spoke boastfully. 21 As I watched, this horn was waging war against the saints and defeating them, 22 until the Ancient of Days came and pronounced judgment in favor of the saints of the Most High, and the time came when they possessed the kingdom.

²³"He gave me this explanation: 'The fourth beast is a fourth kingdom that will appear on earth. It will be different from all the other kingdoms and will devour the whole earth, trampling it down and crushing it. ²⁴The ten horns are ten kings who will come from this kingdom. After them another king will arise, different from the earlier ones; he will subdue three kings. ²⁵He will speak against the Most High and oppress his saints and try to change the set times and the laws. The saints will be handed over to him for a time, times and half a time.

²⁶"But the court will sit, and his power will be taken away and completely destroyed forever.

²⁷Then the sovereignty, power and greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven will be handed over to the saints, the people of the Most High. His kingdom will be an everlasting kingdom, and all rulers will worship and obey him.'

²⁸"This is the end of the matter. I, Daniel, was deeply troubled by my thoughts, and my face turned pale, but I kept the matter to myself."

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 7 SIGNALS a major transition in the book of Daniel. The first half of the book told stories about Daniel and his three friends; we learned about their faith and courage before pagan kings from Nebuchadnezzar to Cyrus. The second half of the book, beginning with chapter 7, reports Daniel's visions of the future. Accordingly, we move from the relatively straightforward narratives of chapters 1–6 to the often enigmatic images of Daniel's prophetic vision.

The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature

IN A WORD, we change genres from the first half of the book to the second. Apocalyptic replaces court narrative, demanding that we change reading strategy. Before launching into an interpretation of this and the following chapters, it is important, though we must necessarily be brief,² to discuss the nature and intention of apocalyptic literature. At this point, we will only examine the genre in terms of its original meaning; in the Bridging Context section, we will explore the legitimate appropriation of apocalyptic into our contemporary world.

The term apocalyptic comes from the Greek word apokalypsis and simply means "revelation." Indeed, the genre label is taken from the first verse of the New Testament book Revelation (also, not surprisingly, known as the Apocalypse of Saint John) and is applied to other books, both in the Bible and outside, that have similar characteristics.

Daniel is clearly such a book, and we will have recourse to connections between Daniel and Revelation as we interpret the second half of the book. But to say that Daniel and Revelation are a "revelation" is not that illuminating. After all, every book of the Bible is a revelation, in the sense that God is uncovering some aspect of his truth to his people. What is so special about sections like Daniel 7–12?

Ironically, we may get a better insight into the book from its common usage in English than we do from its Greek etymology. Some of us remember that the 1960s and early 1970s were called an apocalyptic moment in history. Political instability and the threat of nuclear extinction, still with us but not felt so imminently, led to an uncertainty about the continuance of the human race itself. Apocalyptic, then, in common parlance communicates an impending sense of doom, a feeling that existence might come to an end at any moment.

With this popular understanding of the term we are getting closer to the biblical idea, but we are not quite there yet. A violent end to history is in the ultimate purview of biblical apocalyptic. However, far from imparting a sense of doom and pessimism, books like Daniel and Revelation radiate with joy and optimism. Why? Because the end is the end of human corruption and the oppression of God's people and is brought about by the audience's warring God. Apocalyptic celebrates God's victory over the enemies of the godly.

Immediately, we note how the apocalyptic chapters of Daniel continue the theme we discovered in the first six chapters. The stories of the first half of the book illustrated how, in spite of present appearances, God is in control and will overcome the seemingly invulnerable evil forces of the day. Whether it was the evil plots of the Babylonian wise men or the rage of the king himself, God protected his people and allowed them to prosper even in adversity.

Now the theme goes further. We move from the present circumstances of God's people in captivity to their ultimate liberation. We move from human evil, evident also in the scope of chapters 7–12, to the perverse spiritual forces that stand behind them. We move from deliverance out of a burning furnace and a lions' den to salvation from the power of death itself (ch. 12)!

But the essence of apocalyptic is more than the content of the message; it concerns its inner nature. Now that we have gotten used to the rather straightforward plots of Daniel 1–6 we suddenly find ourselves in a strange world, a world of hybrid beasts and riders on the clouds. Furthermore, we encounter what look like timetables, but timetables that are impossible to penetrate (see below). Whether it is the 2300 mornings and evenings of chapter 8 or the seventy weeks of chapter 9, we have no firm basis for relating these periods to time as we know it. What are we to make of these images and dreamlike numbers?

The interpretation of these specific texts await their proper moment, but some words of introduction to apocalyptic style is in order at this point. To get right to the point, apocalyptic is a metaphor-rich genre. In this regard it is like poetry. Metaphors and similes teach by analogy. They throw light on difficult concepts and things by relating them to something we know from common experience. As such, images speak truly and accurately, but not precisely. We often do not know where the analogy stops. In this way, images preserve mystery about ideas that are ultimately beyond our comprehension. It is a travesty, then, to interpret apocalyptic images too finely, to press them in their details. As we will see, this mistake is common among biblical interpreters of apocalyptic and has led to all kinds of fanciful interpretations and outlandish claims. Caution and reserve are virtues in the interpretation of apocalyptic.

Interestingly, however, the images of Daniel are stranger to us than they were to their original audience. In what follows, we will point out that much of the stuff of the imagery comes from previous biblical revelation or from common motifs found in broader ancient Near Eastern literature. Observing these connections certainly makes the imagery more understandable, but does not erase the intentional ambiguity and sense of mystery.

We would also be remiss in our discussion of the images of apocalyptic if we simply talked about what they meant in terms of their references in the "real" world. Images evoke powerful feelings in readers. Again, because the original readers had a more immediate understanding of these images, the feelings would be more potent and natural in them. We will make the attempt, through our description, to recover these emotions for the modern reader.

Thus, the rest of this commentary is dedicated to the exposition of Daniel's apocalyptic visions. Even chapter 9, which in large part is a prayer, concludes with an apocalyptic timetable. The result is that, just as in chapters 1–6, many of the themes of chapter 7 will be repeated in chapters 8–12. Here are the major themes that reverberate in this section:

• the horror of human evil, particularly as it is concentrated in the state

- the announcement of a specific time of deliverance
- repentance that leads to deliverance
- the revelation that a cosmic war stands behind human conflict
- judgment as certain for those who resist God and oppress his people
- the equally certain truth that God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense.

To state it again, each of these themes appear, more or less, in each of the concluding chapters. However, in order to avoid undue repetition especially in the sections on Contemporary Significance, I plan to emphasize one of these themes in each of the following six chapters. 7, with its vision of four hybrid sea beasts, underlines the horror of human evil. Chapter 8, with its prophecy of the 2300 mornings and evenings, will stress the announcement of a specific time of deliverance. Chapter 9, Daniel's prayer requesting forgiveness for past sins, concerns repentance and restoration. Chapter 10, which pushes back the veil that keeps human beings from observing spiritual realities, will reveal the spiritual battle behind the physical one. Chapter 11, with its prophetic description of history, narrating events of the last few centuries B.C., will show how human evil leads inexorably to judgment. Finally, chapter 12 (treated with chapter 11) will conclude the book on a note of victory and resurrection for God's people.

Daniel 7 begins the apocalyptic section of this book. With its striking imagery of four hybrid beasts arising out of a chaotic sea and its ultimate encounter with the cloud-riding figure who looks like a son of man, this chapter is arguably the best known in the second half of the book. Certainly it is the one most frequently quoted and alluded to in the New Testament. Nonetheless, it is also one of the most enigmatic sections of the Old Testament.

In spite of this, the central message of the chapter is clear: God is in control. He will defeat the seemingly unconquerable powers that oppress his people. The intended effect of this message is also obvious: comfort for the faithful. Evil may seem as if it has the upper hand, but that is a temporary deception. Better to stay faithful and suffer than to fall in with evil and experience God's ultimate judgment.

The chapter may be divided into three parts: (1) horror by the sea (7:1–8); (2) heavenly power (7:9–14); (3) divine victory (7:15–28). The third part also serves as the divinely inspired interpretation of the first two parts, which are different scenes of the same vision.

Horror by the Sea (7:1–8)

THE COURT NARRATIVES ended in the Persian period during the time of Darius the Mede. Chapter 7 scrolls back to the time of Belshazzar, certainly before the event of chapter 5 (which records the last day of Belshazzar's reign and life). The chronological notice in 7:1 indicates that the vision came to Daniel during Belshazzar's first year. Miller suggests that this king's coregency began in 553 B.C., while Goldingay argues for 550/549 B.C. While nothing crucial is at stake here, Goldingay points out the provocative significance of 550/549 B.C., for that was the year that Cyrus the Persian defeated Astyages, his Median overlord. In other words, the process that ultimately led to the demise of Babylonia as the center of human power had begun, and as we will see, one of the main lessons of this chapter is that, although oppressive human power seems unconquerable particularly to the vanquished, human power is in reality temporal. One evil power succeeds another in a cycle of oppression, which will be broken by only divine intervention.

Daniel's vision comes about by means of a dream, and with this note we get an indication of another difference between the closely related genres of prophecy and apocalyptic. Indeed, prophecy and apocalyptic are cousins of one another; they share many similarities, most notably that both at times concern the future. Besides some of the characteristics (content and nature of the message) noted in the section "The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature," apocalyptic is slightly different in terms of the mode of revelation. Whereas the classic prophetic mode of communication is direct from God to the seer, apocalyptic literature reports a more indirect mode of communication.

When God spoke to a prophet like Jeremiah, he spoke directly to him and then told him to speak his message to the people of Judah. When the people responded, the prophet then went back to God for further instructions (Jer. 12). The prophet is God's spokesperson; he brings God's word to the people. A different dynamic is at work in apocalyptic. God speaks to Daniel through a dream (as in Dan. 7) or through a mediator—usually an angel (e.g., Dan. 12:5–13). He is not commissioned to speak to the people but rather to write it down. Significantly, in Daniel 12 the prophet is not commanded to publish his literary revelation broadly, but rather to "close up and seal the words of the scroll until the time of the end" (12:4). The implications of this will be spelled out later in the commentary.

Daniel's report of the vision begins with the setting. He is on the coast of the sea, where the winds are whipping the waves into a frenzy. That Daniel is not giving a scientific description is immediately apparent since he attributes the wildness of the sea to the "four winds of heaven" (v. 2). They are all blowing at once. We are not to simply imagine huge waves crashing into the shore, but rather turbulent, chaotic waters moving in all directions.

On a simple psychological level, this forebodes danger. But reading this description with a broader literary background reveals that even more is at stake here. By the time of Daniel, the sea was already a potent symbol of chaos, indeed of destructive evil.⁵ Here and elsewhere in the second half of Daniel the imagery of the visions may be associated with the mythology of the broader Near East. We may illustrate this with reference to the great creation myths of the Babylonians and the Canaanites.

Let me preface my remarks by pointing out that Daniel's (ultimately God's) use of these images does not mean that the Bible buys into the creation myths themselves. The best understanding of this imagery is that the biblical author evokes well-known mythological motifs to evoke a mood and communicate a message. In the end, as we will observe after we paint the full picture, we will see that, far from mindlessly borrowing this language, the Bible undermines the false religion of its idolatrous neighbors through the use of their imagery.

The most well-known creation story of the Babylonians is the Enuma Elish. This tale begins with an account of the creation of the gods. At the beginning stands primordial Tiamat with her consort Apsu. Both of these deities represent different aspects of the waters. Indeed, Tiamat's name, when translated from the Akkadian, means "the Sea." She is the mother of the next generation of deities, including Enlil and Ea. The generation after Enlil and Ea includes Marduk. The story told in Enuma Elish is about how Marduk becomes the head of the pantheon.

The plot gets underway when Apsu, the father, grows angry with his noisy divine children and purposes to get rid of them. Tiamat, the mother, protests, but does not thwart Apsu's intention. However, Ea, the god of wisdom, catches wind of his intentions and succeeds in doing away with Apsu. Far from solving the problem, however, Tiamat is now enraged and turns her more potent forces against her children. Ea and the other gods stand powerless before her. Marduk comes to the rescue and agrees to fight Tiamat, the Sea, with the proviso that if he succeeds, he will be recognized as chief among the gods.

This is not the place to justify what to us in the twentieth century seems a silly theology. The point is that the myth in all seriousness now relates the creation of the world in the light of the struggle between the Creator and the Sea. The fight is between Marduk, the one who brings order in the world, and Tiamat, the one who by her very nature as water desires to abolish order and boundaries.

The story is dramatically told,⁷ but I will relate just its conclusion. Marduk destroys Tiamat, the Sea, and from her body creates the universe as we know it (including humankind). Nonetheless, somehow the sea continues to threaten to abolish the creation, so that Marduk must set up boundaries and guards to keep the world from reverting to its former formless state. In other words, the sea is a force ranged against God and creation in Mesopotamian theology.

The Canaanites have a similar story to tell,⁸ but in place of Marduk and Tiamat stand their gods Baal and Yam (whose name also means "the Sea").⁹ Yam attempts to take over the leadership of the gods and wants to put Baal in custody. Baal will have nothing to do with it and resists Yam. To make a long story short, he defeats Sea and becomes the head of the pantheon.¹⁰

Again, we should not get lost in the details of these stories. The point is that deep in the psyche of the people of the ancient Near East the sea was more than a dangerous place. It was a threatening force that was ranged against the beneficial forces of creation.

Daniel was not the first one to use sea imagery in this way. Elsewhere in the Old Testament, Yahweh's struggle and victory over evil is recounted as a fight against the sea and its monsters. God blasts the sea with his rebuke (Ps. 18:15); he sets a guard over the sea (Job 7:12; Jer. 5:22); he causes the sea to dry up (Nah. 1:4); he treads on the sea (Hab. 3:15); and he fights the sea monsters (Isa. 27:1).¹¹

The bottom line of this lengthy but important discussion is that the description of the sea at the beginning of Daniel's vision evokes horror and an anticipation of evil. The following verses do not disappoint this expectation.

The scene is thus set. It already evokes horror, but the story is just beginning. Out of the chaotic sea arises four great beasts, one after the other. Before commenting on the beasts individually, I need to make several general observations. (1) The beasts (with the exception of the second) are like none to be found in God's creation. That is the point—they are symbols of forces ranged against God and his creation order. These beasts are bizarre; they are mutants, perversions of what God intended by his creation. As such, they evoke not only horror in the original reader, but also revulsion.

Two lines of evidence indicate to us the Israelite reader's strong reaction to the mixed character of these beasts. (a) The first is the creation story. Here God made the various components of his creation "according to their ... kinds" (*mino: Gen. 1:11–12, 21, 24, 25); the different parts of creation were created to be unique and separate. (b) The Israelite concern with separation of species was embedded in their laws, which indicated that the original creation order was to be preserved through history. A series of laws in Deuteronomy 22:9–11 is a case in point. "Do not plant two kinds of seed in your vineyard; if you do, not only the crops you plant but also the fruit of the vineyard will be defiled. Do not plow with an ox and a donkey yoked together. Do not wear clothes of wool and linen woven together." Thus, the four beasts that arise from the chaotic sea are images of grotesque horror to the original Israelite readers.

(2) We cannot be certain where the specific imagery of the beasts originates. There have been many suggestions. For instance, attention has been drawn to the hybrid beasts of Mesopotamian art.¹² P. A. Porter has read the description of the beasts of Daniel 7 in the light of the description of anomalous births in Babylonian divination texts¹³ and argued that the symbolism derives from those texts.¹⁴ Perhaps the imagery does derive from one or more of these sources; we cannot be sure. In any case, even without the knowledge of the origin of the imagery, the horrific impact of the beasts does not escape us.

(3) An obvious similarity exists between the four-kingdom scheme in the present chapter and the four-kingdom scheme of Nebuchadnezzar's vision in chapter 2. In that chapter we described the conflict between those (mostly conservative) commentators who identified the four successive kingdoms as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, and those who argued for the pattern Babylon, Media, Persia, and Greece. The same debate rages in the interpretation of Daniel 7 as well.

In my opinion there are strengths and weaknesses with both approaches.¹⁷ Perhaps the greatest problem is that chapter 7 goes on to describe the climax of the vision as the complete destruction of human evil power at the hands of the "one like a son of man" (v. 13) and "the saints of the Most High" (v. 18). Even today, more than two and a half millennia after Daniel, we still look to the future for this to happen (see Contemporary Significance section). Ancient Greece is no more; ancient Rome is no more. And contrary to some special pleading on the part of contemporary sensationalist interpretation, there are no modern descendants of the Roman empire today.¹⁸ We will argue that, though the vision begins with the Babylonian empire, its multivalent imagery intends to prohibit definite historical identifications with the remaining three beasts. Rather, the fourfold pattern simply informs us that evil kingdoms will succeed one another (at least seemingly) until the end of time. The people of God must recognize that this is God's plan and prepare for persecution.

(4) These beasts represent "four kingdoms that will rise from the earth" (v. 17), and this from no less an authority than the interpreting angel of the second half of this chapter. We import this divinely imparted insight into our present discussion for economy of discussion, for here we will comment on the meaning and significance of the first three beasts. We will reserve our comments about the fourth beast primarily for the last section of this chapter, since that is where the interpreting angel focuses our attention in verses 15–28.

The beasts come out of the chaotic sea one after the other. The first is described as "like a lion, and it had the wings of an eagle. I watched until its wings were torn off and it was lifted from the ground so that it stood on two feet like a man, and the heart of a man was given to it" (v. 4). As with the statue in chapter 2, we begin in the present. There the head of gold was explicitly identified as Nebuchadnezzar (i.e., the Babylonian empire). Here, in the waning years of that same empire, the most natural interpretation of the symbolism is that it stands for Babylonia. Perhaps the clearest key to this identification is the fact that the hybrid animal becomes human-like, reminiscent of Nebuchadnezzar's own experience as recorded in chapter 4.

The lion and the eagle are both proud animals; they are both animals of prey. They strike fear in the hearts of the other animals, who are their food. Because of these characteristics, many great empires choose one or both animals as their national symbol. There is nothing in particular that relates them to Babylonia.

The same may be said for the second beast that rises out of the sea, the bear. For whatever reason this beast is not a hybrid but it still is a ferocious animal of prey. Indeed, the picture drawn of this particular bear has it gnawing three ribs while it is raised up on one of its sides. Its voracious appetite is encouraged by a voice that cries out, "Get up and eat your fill of flesh!"

It is with this second beast that the classic debate begins. Is the bear Medo-Persia or Media? Historically, we know Persia became a great empire by first acquiring the formerly dominant Medes into its empire. True, it was Cyrus the Persian whose forces defeated the Babylonians in 539 B.C., but it was through the agency (according to the book of Daniel) of Darius the Mede.

The imagery can be pressed to argue either position. The Medo-Persian identification argues that Media never existed as an independent world empire and that the three ribs can be identified with the three great victories of the Medo-Persian alliance: Lydia, Babylon, and Egypt. Gurney, an evangelical who argues for an identification with Media alone, cites Jeremiah 51:27–29, which lists Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz as Media's three allies as they go against Babylon.¹⁹ Walton clarifies this passage by stating that the three "represent respectively Urartu, which was subdued by the Medes in 605 B.C.; Mannaea, an ally of Assyria in its final days, which fell to the Medes shortly after the collapse of Assyria; and the Scythians, who were repulsed by the Medes, probably in the reign of Cyaxares II."²⁰ Thus, we already find ourselves on slippery ground when it comes to specific and concrete historical identifications of the imagery of the four beasts. It is my argument that this is an intentional effect of the imagery of the vision. The purpose is not so much writing history in advance as making a theological statement about the conflict between human evil and God.

The intentional ambiguity continues with the third beast. The beast looks like a leopard, but it has four wings and four heads. As we look for the point of the imagery, we are drawn immediately to the characteristic of speed. Leopards are fast cats, and with the addition of wings, we are to imagine blazing speed. Is the significance of this imagery the blazing speed of the Persian army and are the four heads to be associated with four kings of Persia,²¹ or does it point to Alexander's Blitzkrieg through the Orient and the four generals who divided his vast empire after his early death?

The fourth kingdom is the most enigmatic of all. "It was different from all the former beasts" (v. 7). It appears to be only vaguely animal-like. Later, its description will be expanded to having "iron teeth and bronze claws" (v. 19). Someone like myself who enjoys science fiction is tempted to label this fourth "Robo-beast." But of course, it is not a robot. The metallic composition of its weapons (teeth and claws) simply highlights its destructive power and ruthlessness. There is little concrete description here by which we may argue for a specific identification, so the classic approaches to this text have recourse to simple historical sequence. If one has already identified the first three as Babylon, Media, and Persia, then the fourth must be Greek. If, on the other hand, one has combined Media and Persia and identified the third as Greece, then the fourth kingdom must be Roman. We will return to this question and the function of the horns in the last section of this chapter.

Heavenly Power (7:9–14)

VERSE 9 Is an abrupt transition from the scene by the sea to a courtroom. From its description, we know this is no ordinary courtroom, but again, the vision speaks in images. Note first of all that we no longer have descriptions of animal-like creatures. The two main characters are described in human-like terms: "the Ancient of Days" and the "one like a son of man."

In essence, we have gone up the chain of being. Evil human kingdoms were described as horrifying hybrid animals; the divine realm is imaged as human beings. The association is perfectly appropriate in a broader biblical view because, after all, Genesis 1:27 tells us that God created men and women in his own image.

While it is not clear from the description whether the scene takes place in heaven or on earth,²² the imagery makes it clear that the two main participants are divine and that the attendants are celestial and not human creatures. Much of the imagery is not uncommonly associated with God's appearance (theophany) and signals his wisdom (his white hair), his righteousness (his white clothing), and his power in judgment (fire).

The first figure is called the "Ancient of Days." He is God, specifically in his role as judge. As such, he is imaged as an old and presumably wise human judge sitting in his courtroom. The second figure, "one like a son of man," is more startling in his Old Testament context. He is riding the cloud chariot, which is the prerogative of God alone.

Like the image of the sea, the image of the cloud rider is an ancient one by the time we come to Daniel 7:13. Cloud imagery associated with the Lord's appearance is as old as the Exodus and the pillar of cloud by day and the fire by night (Ex. 13:21). During the climactic theophany on Sinai, the mountain was covered by a cloud (19:16). In the tabernacle, God appeared in the cloud that was present in the Most Holy Place (Lev. 16:2).

We learn of the vehicular cloud, however, in the Psalms and Prophets. God is the cloud rider in Psalm 68:4:

Sing to God, sing praise to his name, extol him who rides on the clouds—his name is the LORD—and rejoice before him.

In Psalm 104:3–4 we read:

He makes the clouds his chariot and rides on the wings of the wind. He makes winds his messengers, flames of fire his servants. The Old Testament prophets also use the cloud-riding image in clear judgment/war contexts. Note Isaiah 19:1 and Nahum 1:3:

See, the LORD rides on a swift cloud and is coming to Egypt.

The idols of Egypt tremble before him, and the hearts of the Egyptians melt within them. The LORD is slow to anger and great in power; the LORD will not leave the guilty unpunished. His way is in the whirlwind and the storm, and clouds are the dust of his feet.

Like the sea image, the motif of God riding clouds also has an ancient Near Eastern background. This connection may be most closely observed in the literature from Ugarit. Baal, the chief deity and primary divine warrior of that culture, is often called the "Rider on the Clouds." Indeed it is one of his most common epithets:

"Hearken, O Puissant Baal: Give heed, O Rider on the Clouds."²³

This example could be multiplied many times. Baal was the god of the thunderstorm in the Ugaritic pantheon. His cloud-riding was appropriate to his function.

Thus, Daniel 7:1–14 presents the reader with two image clusters. On the one hand, we have four beasts and horns, which represent depraved human kingdoms; on the other hand, we see two human figures, the Ancient of Days and one like a son of man, who image the divine realm. The identity of the "one like a son of man" has been a difficult one through the history of interpretation. We will reserve discussion of this critical issue for the section on Contemporary Significance.

The vision is more than descriptive of these two realms: human evil and divine judgment. It also narrates a conflict between the two, with a certain and clear conclusion. "The beast," presumably the boastful horn, was destroyed, while the one like the son of man was exalted and given an eternal kingdom. In a word, though human evil thrives in the present, God is in control and will have the final victory. The implicit message to God's people is: "Remain faithful in spite of appearances." The interpretation of the vision that follows bears this message out.

Divine Victory (7:15–28)

DANIEL REACTS TO the vision with fear and confusion. His fear signals to us later readers the overwhelming force of the revelation. Daniel looks into the abyss of human evil and into the very throne room of God. No wonder he is shaken by the experience. His confusion drives him to an angel who is present to assist him with the interpretation of these marvelous things.

The angel's initial response is short and sweet: "The four great beasts are four kingdoms that will rise from the earth. But the saints of the Most High will receive the kingdom and will possess it forever—yes, for ever and ever" (vv. 17–18). As simply stated as this answer is, an ambiguity remains that is not directly addressed in what follows, namely, the identity of the "saints of the Most High." Those who read this expression in modern English translations today most naturally think of "saints" as human and take it as a reference to God's oppressed people. However, in the Aramaic (qaddise 'elyonim) and in the context of its use in the Dead Sea scrolls and elsewhere in Daniel (4:13; 8:13), the phrase refers to angelic beings.

The debate on this issue has raged, but the angelic interpretation is by far the most dominant today.²⁴ Certainly, it paints a powerful picture that will be further expanded in chapter 10. Behind the earthly struggle stands a cosmic struggle. The exiled Israelites are not just engaged in an earthly battle, but one with heavenly significance. That God and his angels will "receive the kingdom" is good news to those who are on God's side on earth.

Nonetheless, the phrase can refer to human beings as well,²⁵ and perhaps it is best understood to imply both God's human and angelic creatures. Whether it refers directly to God's people or indirectly to them through their spiritual representatives, the message is the same: God will win this great cosmic battle. This is good news for all of those who follow God, especially those who feel the cruel hand of their evil oppressors.

But Daniel's confusion and fear have not yet subsided, so he follows up his question with another, this time focusing on the nature of the fourth beast. The significance of the fourth beast is its climactic place in the future. It intensifies the evil of its predecessors and produces pernicious offspring in the form of eleven horns. The eleventh horn is the most rebellious: "He will speak against the Most High and oppress his saints and try to change the set times and the laws. The saints will be handed over to him for a time, times and half a time" (v. 25).

The image of a horn is well known from other biblical references. Pride and honor, whether godly (1 Sam. 2:1; Ps. 89:17[18], 24[25]; 112:9) or ungodly (Ps. 75:5), is often described by the image of a lifted-up horn, stemming from the idea of a powerful animal lifting its head high. In our present passage, the connotation is that of uncalled-for pride. It is a rebellious refusal to submit to God.

As already indicated, much energy has been exerted as to the identity of the fourth beast and the associated horns. A strong case can be made (based especially on the clear meaning of Dan. 8) that the fourth beast is Greece and the ten horns are the kings that followed Alexander (though working that out is difficult), with the climactic horn being associated with the insidious figure of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who oppressed God's faithful people in the middle of the second century B.C.

Critics, however, have pointed out that although Antiochus himself died and passed from the scene, his death could hardly be said to be followed by the incoming of God's kingdom.²⁶ For this reason, other scholars have argued that the fourth kingdom must be Rome and the ten horns should be identified as ten kingdoms that arise from that political entity, to be followed by a climactic rebel to be identified as the Antichrist in the New Testament. We will say more about the latter in the Contemporary Significance section. But for now let it suffice to say that there is much to commend this approach in the light of later, fuller biblical revelation. The little horn will be defeated at the conclusion of the great cosmic struggle, a point to which the world has not yet arrived.

The only criticism to be made is the insistence that the fourth kingdom be specifically identified with Rome. Rome exists no more; it cannot be revived except perhaps in political propaganda. There are no Roman people, for instance. To think of the ten horns and the little horn as future manifestations of the Roman empire is bizarre. The best way to view the imagery of Daniel 7 is not in terms of four specific evil empires, but as four kingdoms symbolically representing the fact that evil kingdoms (of an unspecified number)²⁷ will succeed one another from the time of the Exile to the time of the climax of history, when God will intervene and once and for all judge all evil and bring into existence his kingdom.

It remains to comment on the enigmatic phrase "a time, times and half a time." This chronological reference is in answer to the implicit question of how long the little horn will be allowed to flaunt his power against God and his "saints." This expression is often taken to mean "one year, two years, and half a year," that is, three and a half years. The claim is then made that later chronological references give roughly the same time period. Those who believe the little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes cite the period of time as roughly equal to the time that king wreaked havoc with the religion of the Jewish people in 168–165 B.C. Some of those who believe the reference is to the future time of the Antichrist prefer to speak of three and a half years of tribulation for God's people at the time of the second coming of Christ.

However, questions must be raised about attempts to make this symbolic number so specific. After all, the second phrase is "times," not "two times" (i.e., it is plural, not dual). It is not impossible that the noun can stand for years (if so, it should be understood as "year, years, and half a year"), though it is not clear that it does in this context. It is better to understand this reference to be as vague as it sounds on first reading. Keil is on firmer ground when he argues that the force of the expression is symbolic. That is, the rebellion of the little horn will get off to a fast start and seem like it is going to last forever, but then is suddenly cut off.³⁰

At the end, Daniel remains troubled by the vision. Though it ends well from the perspective of the godly, it does paint a picture of continued and difficult oppression. The divine victory does not come easily, but through a cosmic struggle. But God had more in store for Daniel, as the next chapter immediately demonstrates.

Bridging Contexts

WE HAVE MOVED from historical narration, stories rooted in real events, to apocalyptic visions. In the first half of the book, we have dealt with stories about the past and their relevance for our present at the end of the twentieth century. In the second half of the book, beginning with the present chapter, the question concerns the relevance of Daniel's visions of the future for us many centuries later.

Apocalyptic frenzy is rearing its head once again, according to "Dark Prophecies," a recent US News and World Report article.³¹ In the magazine's poll of Americans, 66 percent, including a third of those who say they never attend church, admit that they believe Jesus Christ will return to earth some day. Unfortunately, interest in apocalyptic literature does not necessarily add up to competence in interpretation.

I have already stated that Daniel, living in the sixth century B.C., saw things beyond even his immediate future. Indeed, most would agree that Daniel's vision here and in the following chapter culminates at the climax of history, when God will come and rid the world of its evil oppressors and set up his own eternal kingdom. When stated in this way, we begin to see the continuing relevance of the apocalyptic chapters of the book of Daniel. We still live in, as Paul puts it, a "present evil age" (Gal. 1:4), from which we look to God for deliverance. In the next section, we will describe this age a little more closely as well as God's further revelation concerning our deliverance, but for now we need to pause and explore the principles for applying the lessons of ancient apocalyptic to our modern age and also bring to the fore the dominant themes of this particular chapter.

Principles for applying ancient apocalyptic. (1) The first principle for applying ancient apocalyptic is this: "Be reserved." That is, we must exercise caution in our interpretation of these highly metaphoric visions. This caution is particularly relevant on the eve of the end of the second millennium A.D. At different times and in different places, the church has found its attention riveted on the apocalyptic texts of the Bible. Don't misunderstand, the pictures of the end that apocalyptic gives us are always relevant to the church, but occasionally God's people become obsessed with them.

Typically, these times are times of persecution or great distress for the church or society. It is not surprising that perhaps one of the best-selling books of all time, Hal Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth,³² a sensationalist book dealing with biblical apocalyptic, was published during the socially turbulent 1960s or that the recent Gulf War saw the publication and excessive sales of other books, cashing in on supposed connections between modern events and biblical apocalyptic.³³ While the interpretations of these books cannot be defended, they do demonstrate the original intention of apocalyptic: to provide comfort to God's people during times of trouble.

But what makes apocalyptic particularly relevant for today? In some countries around the world, Christians find themselves in deep distress, experiencing persecution. For them, the message of apocalyptic is relevant in the same way that we just described. In the West, however, even though this is a time of relative peace and economic security, apocalyptic has captured the attention of many because of the turn of the millennium. The same phenomenon could be seen a thousand years ago in Europe, the last time the millennium changed. Medieval Europe was a culture saturated in Christian theology, so the impact of apocalyptic speculation was more widespread; but even today, everyone knows the significance of Waco and many of the unsettling apocalyptic pronouncements of Harold Camping.³⁴ Others have seen the tract "Eighty-Eight Reasons for 1988" by Mr. Edgar Whisenant, and other claims that we live in the time of the end.

In Daniel 8 we will deal more specifically with the (mis)use of apocalyptic materials to try to determine whether we are living on the eve of the end of time, but for now let this serve as a signal that as we deal with these materials, we do so with reserve and caution.

(2) We do this first by remembering that we are dealing with a type of literature that uses images with high frequency. Images communicate truth, to be sure, but not with precision. An image brings together two things that are essentially not alike in order to cast light on some aspect of the object of teaching. God is an "Ancient of Days," sitting as a judge on a throne. Literally, of course, God is not an old man, nor does he sit on a physical throne. Evil human kingdoms are hybrid beasts. Yes, but not literally. To approach this material as if it demands or even invites a literal interpretation is wrongheaded. Thus, a crucial principle to reading apocalyptic literature according to its original intention is to expect images. It is wrong to say that we interpret apocalyptic literally except when it is absurd to do so.

Now, the key to the interpretation of images is to find the point of connection and not push the peripheral elements of the comparison. This means we will be left with a gray area in our interpretation. Some of the points of comparison will be obvious, but others will not be. At such points we need to hold back and not insist on our interpretation.

- (3) A further important point that will prevent us from typical misunderstanding is that numbers are especially used in a symbolic manner in apocalyptic. Whether it is the "time, times, and half a time" of Daniel 7 or the "seventy weeks" of Daniel 9 or the one thousand years of Revelation 20, we must expect that we are dealing with symbolic numbers because that is the nature of apocalyptic as a genre.³⁵
- (4) One important way we can guard ourselves against misinterpreting these powerful images is by imagining ourselves as among those who heard these things at the time of Daniel. In the earlier discussion, I noted the ancient Near Eastern background of many of the images of Daniel 7—the sea and cloud-riding in particular. It is an important principle to read all Scripture in its original setting, especially apocalyptic. This principle, of course, calls for some work as we interpret, but the fact that you are reading this commentary indicates that you are willing to engage in the necessary task of research for proper biblical interpretation.

I want to qualify this last point by saying that the basic message of apocalyptic is communicated even to modern readers without extensive research. One cannot help but understand that the vision teaches God's people that, although it looks as if the world is under the power of human evil running rampant and is not under God's control, in this case looks are deceiving. God is in control, and there is no question concerning who is going to win this struggle. Stay faithful. Yet to prevent the outlandish and speculative interpretation of this material that is only too common, we must remember that the images and language come from antiquity.

Dominant themes of Daniel 7. To conclude by way of summary, Daniel 7 is a vision of two parts. The first part reveals that the world at present is under the sway of evil and cruel human power. The second part shows us that God is in control and will ultimately judge the rebels and establish his kingdom among us. At present there is conflict—indeed, a cosmic war, about which we will learn more particularly in chapter 10—between the evil forces of this world and God and his faithful creatures. These, then, are the important apocalyptic themes to explore in the Contemporary Significance section: the nature of human evil, the warring activity of God, and the certainty of ultimate victory.

THE NATURE OF human evil. Daniel 7 paints a horrifying picture of human evil. The hybrid beasts represent powerful, destructive forces that intend to harm others. The metal teeth and the iron claws of the fourth beast intend to rip into its prey, and the godly know that they are the beast's intended meal.

Many Christians around the world today immediately understand this image. Christians in many countries know and experience the harsh rule of regimes that hate Christianity and will expend great efforts to squash its practice. In the present day, Christians in China, Indonesia, Iraq, Iran, to name just a few, live in daily fear of losing their freedom, if not their lives. In other countries—one thinks of Israeli citizens who choose to follow Christ—the threat is not physical torture, but extreme prejudice against their religious practice (not to speak of the far more numerous Palestinian Christians who live under foreign oppression). These brothers and sisters have no trouble recognizing the beast-like nature of the world in which they live.

Most Christians in the West, however, enjoy a freedom from religious harassment that may not be total, but is certainly nearly unprecedented in human history. We often forget this as we bitterly rail against the loss of "blue laws," threats against our churches' tax-free status, or our government's support of the right to abortion. Where is the beast gnawing on the bones of the people of God in the United States? After all, we see pleasant neighborhoods with our nice neighbors and flourishing churches. We wonder: "What is all this talk about superhuman power of destructive human evil?"

Of course, this experience and attitude are not shared by all Christians in America. Some of our neighborhoods, particularly in our large urban centers, are the scene of daily violence and fear. The harm is not directed especially toward the church, but Christian people find themselves in near war zones because of the actions of the renegades of our society, whether those renegades are the criminal element or crooked police. These brothers and sisters in Christ also resonate immediately with the picture of life as a battleground with life-and-death consequences—a battleground from which they desire deliverance.

However, deep down, if not on the surface, those Christians who are fortunate enough not to live in a literal battle zone understand that life is a struggle, sometimes just annoying but at least occasionally a battle of nearly epic proportions. We know that whatever "peace" we experience now in our life is just a lull in the midst of a storm.

The Bible, after all, teaches that all human beings are sinners. The picture of the beasts in Daniel 7 is consistent with this lesson we learn throughout the Bible—every man and woman at heart is a self-seeking rebel against God, and we would crawl over the bodies of our fellow human beings in order to seek some small advantage for ourselves.

In a classic statement on the scope and depth of sin in the human heart, Paul collects a series of quotations from the Old Testament and strings them together in a universal condemnation of humanity (Rom. 3:10–18):

There is no one righteous, not even one;
there is no one who understands,
no one who seeks God.

All have turned away,
they have together become worthless;
there is no one who does good,
not even one.

Their throats are open graves;
their tongues practice deceit.

The poison of vipers is on their lips.
Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness.

Their feet are swift to shed blood;
ruin and misery mark their ways,
and the way of peace they do not know.
There is no fear of God before their eyes.

No one escapes this judgment—not the ruthless dictator, the benevolent president, the hard-working mayor, our law-abiding neighbor, our children and spouse, and especially not ourselves. Everyone is a sinner, "swift to shed blood." The beast is in the heart of each one of us.

Cornelius Plantinga has written an insightful analysis of the biblical view of sin, in which he defines sin as a breaking of "shalom," the Hebrew word for "wholeness, health, peace." In his words, "shalom is God's design for creation and redemption; sin is blamable human vandalism of these great realities and therefore an affront to their architect and builder."³⁶

We should be quick to point out that God did not create us as "vandals." He created us in his image. The Garden of Eden was a picture of shalom until the appearance of the serpent. The serpent's identity in the Garden is obscure, though later biblical reflection makes it clear that this is Satan (cf. Rev. 12:9), the supernatural rebel. This creature introduced disharmony into the peace of the Garden, but human sin was not his responsibility. As I was driving the other day, I saw a bumper sticker that simply said, "Eve was framed." That is not the biblical story. Eve was neither framed nor coerced, nor was Adam. The disobedience of Adam and Eve broke the shalom of the Garden when they took the side of the serpent against God.

We know this first sin as the Fall (Gen. 3). Adam and Eve were ejected from the Garden into a harsh land of their own making. We are the heirs of our primordial parents. We are born sinners, but not in the sense that we are tagged with the guilt of our ancestors. No, we weren't framed either. The point is that we would have acted in the same way as Adam and Eve if we were in their place. And indeed we act in the same way from birth. We are born rebels, vandals, breakers of shalom.

But the beasts are more than individual sinners. The beasts represent corporate rebellion as well.³⁷ Yet it is important to realize that corporate rebellion is a product that flows from individual sin, not vice versa. Otherwise, individuals may flee responsibility for corporate harm.

The beasts represent "kingdoms," not just one sinner but an organized plurality of sinners. I remember the wise words of my former teacher, Jay Adams, when he warned his young students about an overly romantic view of marriage. He alerted us that marriage would not be the answer to all our loneliness or problems. He said that our current problems flowed from the fact that we, like all human beings, are sinners. He then reminded us that marriage was a union of two sinners and challenged us by saying, "What do you think happens when two sinners are brought together?" His warning was wise because it prevented us from being shocked when, after marriage, we had our first disagreement or argument.

Adams was talking about a marriage of two Christians. Imagine the union of thousands, millions, and today even billions of sinners? Imagine further that a handful of these sinners are given the power of decision, even the power of incredible destructive forces. Can we really be surprised at the callousness of an oriental despot, a Caesar, a medieval king, a Führer, an Ayatollah, or a president?

Individual sinners are harmful, sometimes deeply. But sinners bound together behind a group cause can cause great devastation. Nationalism, racism, sexism, denominationalism, factionalism—great evil can arise when sinners come together with a common purpose against someone outside of the group, the "other." We can depersonalize the other; they aren't quite human, and so to harm the other is not quite the same as hurting one of our own. George Steiner reminds modern sophisticated culture that such attitudes reside in the breasts of all people:

It would be fantastically arrogant to suppose that we know that we have evolved into a kind of creature that likes living with those that smell different, look different, sound different. Sit in a railway carriage or bus in a land where you don't speak a single word of the language. Have you ever noticed the panic that starts growing in your civilized soul, the sense that something is hideously wrong, that your very identity may soon be torn apart? It could be that autonomy is the natural form of the social unit, and that those who would thrust others together may be doing so in the name of a transcendent vision of justice, hope, human fairness, but that they may also be hurrying something very complicated. We don't know. Human beings do tend to be with their own. Not all. Not the exceptional. But most human beings.³⁸

Of course, not every nation or its ruler is a repository of evil. We must also account for common grace as well as the work of the Holy Spirit. But the phrase "power corrupts" rings true for a reason. The point is that the power of the beast image is as true today as it was at the time of Daniel, when God's people were oppressed by Babylon, in the middle of the second century B.C., when they were oppressed by the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes, or at the time of Jesus, when the Romans held sway in Palestine.

The warring activity of God. Ultimately, the battle is "not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12). This ultimate spiritual battle behind our earthly struggles was anticipated in the Old Testament (see esp. the comments in Dan. 10), but the New Testament rips away the curtain so that we see the heart of the battle.

This battle will continue until the final day. When we turn to Revelation 13, what do we encounter? A beast, indeed, a beast emerging from the sea. Revelation's imagery derives most immediately from the book of Daniel.³⁹ This insight reminds us of our continuity with the fears and struggles of Daniel's generation. We too find ourselves in a struggle that threatens to overwhelm us.

But Daniel did not just paint a picture of horrifying and seemingly invulnerable evil. We will reserve discussion for the chapters to follow, but we cannot leave Daniel 7 without attention to the picture of hope in the midst of the chaos. A "son of man" rides a cloud to the rescue of those who are oppressed by the beastly human kingdoms. We have already commented that the cloud signals the divine status of this human-like figure. Only God rides the ethereal war chariot.

But the more precise identity of this figure awaits the fuller revelation of the New Testament. In Revelation 1:7 and in the so-called "little apocalypses" of the Gospels (cf. Mark 13:26), Jesus himself is the One who rides the cloud chariot into the final battle. Jesus is the divine warrior, who will defeat the beast, the forces of evil at the end of time.

The certainty of ultimate victory. How can we be sure of victory? What makes us think that Jesus will conquer rather than the serpent? The cross is our guarantee. Jesus defeated Satan on the cross. This is the testimony of Paul, who wrote concerning the removal of our sin: "He took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:14–15).

Paul's use of military language is not accidental, but is part and parcel of the canon-wide theme of divine warfare. From the beginning of the canon (Ex. 15:3) to its end in Revelation, God's people are told that their Lord fights for them against the evil that oppresses them—both external enemies and the sin that remains in their own hearts.⁴⁰ This is the comfort that the Bible presents to God's people today, whether a Christian in an Iranian jail or one in America feeling the ridicule of a "toxic culture"⁴¹ in the West. God has won the victory on the cross, and history's victorious denouement is certain.

Daniel 7 gives us a glimpse of the warfare that explains conflict in the world today, and chapters 10–12 will take us even further into these divine mysteries.

Daniel 8:1-27

¹In the third year of King Belshazzar's reign, I, Daniel, had a vision, after the one that had already appeared to me. ²In my vision I saw myself in the citadel of Susa in the province of Elam; in the vision I was beside the Ulai Canal. ³I looked up, and there before me was a ram with two horns, standing beside the canal, and the horns were long. One of the horns was longer than the other but grew up later. ⁴I watched the ram as he charged toward the west and the north and the south. No animal could stand against him, and none could rescue from his power. He did as he pleased and became great.

⁵As I was thinking about this, suddenly a goat with a prominent horn between his eyes came from the west, crossing the whole earth without touching the ground. ⁶He came toward the two-horned ram I had seen standing beside the canal and charged at him in great rage. ⁷I saw him attack the ram furiously, striking the ram and shattering his two horns. The ram was powerless to stand against him; the goat knocked him to the ground and trampled on him, and none could rescue the ram from his power. ⁸The goat became very great, but at the height of his power his large horn was broken off, and in its place four prominent horns grew up toward the four winds of heaven.

⁹Out of one of them came another horn, which started small but grew in power to the south and to the east and toward the Beautiful Land. ¹⁰It grew until it reached the host of the heavens, and it threw some of the starry host down to the earth and trampled on them. ¹¹It set itself up to be as great as the Prince of the host; it took away the daily sacrifice from him, and the place of his sanctuary was brought low. ¹²Because of rebellion, the host ∟of the saints and the daily sacrifice were given over to it. It prospered in everything it did, and truth was thrown to the ground.

¹³Then I heard a holy one speaking, and another holy one said to him, "How long will it take for the vision to be fulfilled—the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, the rebellion that causes desolation, and the surrender of the sanctuary and of the host that will be trampled underfoot?"

¹⁴He said to me, "It will take 2,300 evenings and mornings; then the sanctuary will be reconsecrated."

¹⁵While I, Daniel, was watching the vision and trying to understand it, there before me stood one who looked like a man. ¹⁶And I heard a man's voice from the Ulai calling, "Gabriel, tell this man the meaning of the vision."

¹⁷As he came near the place where I was standing, I was terrified and fell prostrate. "Son of man," he said to me, "understand that the vision concerns the time of the end."

¹⁸While he was speaking to me, I was in a deep sleep, with my face to the ground. Then he touched me and raised me to my feet.

¹⁹He said: "I am going to tell you what will happen later in the time of wrath, because the vision concerns the appointed time of the end. ²⁰The two-horned ram that you saw represents the kings of Media and Persia. ²¹The shaggy goat is the king of Greece, and the large horn between his eyes is the first king. ²²The four horns that replaced the one that was broken off represent four kingdoms that will emerge from his nation but will not have the same power.

²³"In the latter part of their reign, when rebels have become completely wicked, a stern-faced king, a master of intrigue, will arise. ²⁴He will become very strong, but not by his own power. He will cause astounding devastation and will succeed in whatever he does. He will destroy the mighty men and the holy people. ²⁵He will cause deceit to prosper, and he will consider himself superior. When they feel secure, he will destroy many and take his stand against the Prince of princes. Yet he will be destroyed, but not by human power.

²⁶"The vision of the evenings and mornings that has been given you is true, but seal up the vision, for it concerns the distant future."

²⁷I, Daniel, was exhausted and lay ill for several days. Then I got up and went about the king's business. I was appalled by the vision; it was beyond understanding.

Original Meaning

THE CONNECTION OF Daniel 8 with chapter 7 is obvious. The first verse associates the two by introducing the second vision as occurring "after the one that had already appeared to me." It comes from approximately the same time period, Belshazzar's third year, two years after chapter 7. In addition, the actors in the prophetic visions of both chapters are animals, and we soon see that these animals represent kingdoms, that is, political entities. In both cases, there is a concluding focus on a horn that emanates from these animals. Finally, both chapters concern hostility between the animal kingdoms and the divine realm.

But closer examination forces us to recognize differences between the chapters as well. Some appear relatively incidental to the meaning of the text. For instance, the prophecy in chapter 7 is called a dream, whereas the prophecy in eight is termed a "vision." From the description of the two, the distinction is not so much in terms of content or form, but rather in terms of the way the prophecy is mediated to Daniel (see comment below on v. 1).

Another difference between the prophecies of the two chapters has to do with the nature of the animals and the transparency of the imagery. In chapter 7, we encountered hybrid animals of grotesque appearance, while in chapter 8, the animals seem normal (with the possible exception of the horns). In our description below, we will see the ease with which we can associate these animals and their horns with particular and well-known political entities. This fact explains why commentators over the years have registered little of the interpretive disagreement that we saw in chapter 7.

The similarities between these two chapters mean that the themes of the two are closely related. Indeed, we have already indicated that chapters 7–12 focus on six important themes:

- the horror of human evil, particularly as it is concentrated in the state
- the announcement of a specific time of deliverance
- repentance that leads to deliverance
- the revelation that a cosmic war stands behind human conflict
- judgment as certain for those who resist God and oppress his people
- the equally certain truth that God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense.

While we will have occasion to comment on each of these themes in this chapter, in keeping with our intention to focus on one of these themes in each of chapters 7–12 (see comments in "The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature" in the Original Meaning section of chapter 7), we will pay particular attention here to the issue of the announcement of a specific time of deliverance. Furthermore, we would be remiss if we did not point out that the overarching theme of this chapter supports the major theme of the book as a whole: In spite of present circumstances, God will win in the end.

However, Daniel 8 not only has connections within the book of Daniel. As we read this chapter, we cannot help but think of Ezekiel. Daniel finds himself at the Ulai canal outside of Susa when he receives his vision (1:2), reminiscent of Ezekiel beside the Kebar River (Ezek. 1:1). Ezekiel too symbolically represented people through the use of animal and shepherd imagery (Ezek. 34).² This connection with Ezekiel will help us to understand the nature of Daniel's vision.

With chapter 8 the book reverts to Hebrew (Aramaic being the language of chs. 2–7). No explanation for the switch back is given in the text, and no scholarly argument has yet achieved a consensus of opinion.

The vision of Daniel in this chapter has, generally speaking, a two-part structure: (1) the vision of a ram and a goat (8:1–14), and (2) the interpretation of the vision (8:15–27).

The Vision of a Ram and a Goat (8:1–14)

Daniel's vision takes place in the third year of Belshazzar's reign. If Hasel is correct, this situates the vision in 548/547 B.C.³ In the vision, Daniel is located near the city of Susa (in the province of Elam) on the Ulai Canal. Some think that Daniel was literally present in this location,⁴ and as a high official in the realm, he certainly could have traveled this distance.⁵ However, the connections noted above with the book of Ezekiel suggests that Daniel, like Ezekiel, was carried to the Ulai by means of his prophetic vision, not physically.

When Daniel had his vision, Susa was already an ancient city and was the leading city of Elam. Later, however, it would become the winter residence of the Persian kings. The significance of the location is probably that it was outside of the Babylonian empire and near the center of future power. According to Collins, the Ulai Canal was a human-made waterway that was called the Eulaeus in later classical writings. Towner is wrong to deny the existence of this waterway or the fact that Susa was an active city during Belshazzar's reign.

The first thing that presents itself to Daniel in the vision is a ram. This ram has two horns and charges with great success in three directions: west, north, and south.

Then a second animal interrupts his vision of the ram. It is a goat, coming from the west. Notable about the goat is a single large horn. This goat attacks the ram ferociously and succeeds in knocking off its horns. The goat utterly overwhelms the ram. It has great speed, indicated by its racing across the landscape "without touching the ground" (v. 5). However, the goat's power does not last forever, perhaps only a very short time. There is no slow decline of its power, but it is suddenly cut off. The prominent horn is broken and in its place grow four others, spreading out in four directions.

The description of the success and travail of the ram and the goat are simply a prelude to the focus of the passage, which centers on a small horn that grows out of one of the four. Already, we know that the symbol of the horn points to a king or a kingdom.⁸ This small horn takes on large proportions as it grows to the south, to the east, and toward the Beautiful Land. The latter can be none other than Israel itself, the land of milk and honey (cf. Ezek. 20:6, 15), the land considered most attractive by virtue of a divine perspective appreciated by Daniel.

But the growth of this small horn reaches beyond human dimensions. It grows until it attains the "host of the heavens" (v. 10) and enters into a conflict with this heavenly army. Strikingly, the text reports that the small horn achieves some measure of success against its rivals in the sky. Then, climactically, the horn challenges "the Prince of the host" (v. 11). Significantly, its incursion against the Prince is described as harm done to the formal worship of Israel: "It took away the daily sacrifice." This sacrifice may refer specifically to the morning and evening sacrifices at the temple (Ex. 29:39–41; Num. 28:3–8), or it may refer to a disruption of the entire temple ritual. The latter interpretation may be supported by the line that "the place of his [the Prince's] sanctuary was brought low" (v. 11).

Verse 12 is difficult and its interpretation uncertain: "Because of rebellion, the host Lof the saints," and the daily sacrifice were given over to it." The NIV indicates by the half brackets that the genitive phrase "of the saints" is added and suggests in a footnote that the "host" can be taken as "the armies." Indeed, the Hebrew word for "host" usually has military connotations." The problem of the verse surrounds the reference to "rebellion" and "host/armies." We reserve full discussion of the latter when we come to the more illuminating interpretation section in the second half of the chapter, but our conclusion will be that the primary reference is to the heavenly armies of God. Associated with them are faithful Israelites, who fight against the incursions of the small horn (8:9, also to be identified below).

In a word, it is clear that God's side will take some blows during the struggle "because of the rebellion." Is this the rebellion of the little horn or of God's people. Arguments can be given for either side of this debate, but within this chapter little evidence exists for the latter view. True, in chapter 9 responsibility for the plight of the Israelites in the Babylonian exile rests squarely on the shoulders of the rebellious people. Here, however, we are not talking about the condition of God's people in the sixth century; rather, as we will soon see, we are hearing about the struggles of God's faithful people in the middle of the second century. While it is true that the reference could be to those Jewish people who drifted from God's way at that time, that is doubtful. The meaning of the passage appears to be that God's people suffer at the hands of a power that rebels against God and seeks to take his place.

Again, the astounding fact is that this little horn succeeds at least for a while and that the "truth" was thrown to the ground. Our identification of the historical circumstance in view here awaits the next section, but we will anticipate that discussion by saying that this statement finds its fulfillment in the burning of Torah scrolls by the little horn, as recorded in 1 Maccabees 1:56–57, which describes events in the middle of the second century B.C.: "The books of the law that they found they tore to pieces and burned with fire. Anyone found possessing the book of the covenant, or anyone who adhered to the law, was condemned to death by the decree of the king" (NRSV).

At this point, the action of the vision of Daniel 8 stops. Note that throughout the vision there is no indication of a reversal, a victory of the forces of God over the power of the small horn. The first half of chapter 8 concludes rather with a discussion between two celestial creatures about "how long" these horrible events will last. That "how long" is reminiscent of a frequent lament in the Psalms (cf. Pss. 6:3; 13:1–2; 35:17).

How long will the sanctuary and its ritual be disrupted? While the one celestial being directs his question to the other, it is notable that the answer is addressed not to the celestial being, but rather to Daniel (v. 14): "It will take 2,300 evenings and mornings; then the sanctuary will be reconsecrated."

It is with the interpretation of this chronological statement that we encounter the most disagreement about the interpretation of the symbolism of the chapter. Literally, the phrase translates "evening, morning—two thousand, three hundred." Does this mean 2300 days, reflecting the language of Genesis 1 ("there was evening, and there was morning—the [Xth] day")? Or does it mean 1150 days, with the reference to evening and morning being to the daily sacrifices? In other words, were there 1150 morning sacrifices and 1150 evening sacrifices, totaling 2300 sacrifices but 1150 days? Our answer to this question also awaits the interpretation that follows.

The Interpretation of the Vision (8:15–27)

THE VISION HAS come to an end and Daniel struggles to understand its significance. Suddenly, a humanlike figure appears before him, and he hears the voice of another person "from the Ulai." The text suggests¹² that the voice is disembodied and seems to hover over the waterway. The first figure is named; he is Gabriel (meaning "God's hero"), a leading angel in God's heavenly army.¹³ The source of the voice is not named, but we are surely to believe that it is the voice of God himself, who, after all, commands this powerful angelic being to reveal to Daniel the meaning of the vision that he has been watching.

Gabriel approaches Daniel, and Daniel, overwhelmed by the spiritual power that stands before him, drops to his face. The first words from Gabriel announces the interpretation of the vision under a general heading: It "concerns the time of the end" (v. 17). Later, he will describe the scope of the vision as "what will happen later in the time of wrath, because the vision concerns the appointed time of the end" (v. 19).

This general introduction might at first lead us to believe that the vision concerns the end of history, the consummation, what Christians now refer to as "the Second Coming." Indeed, this phrase can have that sense (cf. 12:4). Some scholars opt for this meaning in this passage.¹⁴ But the clear interpretation of the context of the vision's climax places it squarely in the middle of the second century B.C. In light of that context, we believe that the phrase indicates the end of the persecution initiated by the little horn, identified below with the Seleucid king Antiochus IV.¹⁵

Gabriel interprets the animal symbolism given earlier in the chapter in a precise manner. Unlike chapter 7, where the animals are said to be "four kingdoms," here they are identified with particular and well-known political entities. The ram with the two horns represents the "kings of Media and Persia" (v. 20). In the vision itself, one horn grew larger than the other, which is surely a reference to the fact that the Persian part of this empire soon swallowed the Median part and assumed dominance.

The goat with the single horn that speedily devastated the ram is "Greece," the single horn being its first king—Alexander the Great. He achieved an unprecedented domination from Italy to India in unbelievable time; but he died suddenly at age 33 in 323 B.C., leaving behind two young sons, Alexander and Herakles.¹⁷ These boys were ultimately murdered, and the world was carved up between Alexander's powerful generals, the Diadochi. The Diadochi are the "four prominent horns" (v. 8; cf. v. 22).

The vision then skips over about two centuries of history (later detailed in the vision of ch. 11). For now the focus goes immediately to one particular horn. Scholars almost universally agree that the horn that grew out of one of the four is the second century B.C. Seleucid ruler, Antiochus IV Epiphanes. We know much about this king from intertestamental writings like the Maccabees. He started out small and grew large. He was not actually the first in line to succeed his older brother Seleucus IV, but through the political manipulation for which he became famous (he was a "master of intrigue" [v. 23]), he managed to push his nephew out of the way and gain the throne. He grew large through military success, pushing his influence into Egypt as well as east into Persian, Parthia, and Armenia, not to speak of his domination of Palestine.

Antiochus IV, however, established himself as a "completely wicked" and "stern-faced king" (v. 23) through his incredible intrusion and disruption of the Jewish ritual. Jewish religion and practice stood in the way of his policy of Hellenization, and among other atrocities, he ordered the cessation of temple sacrifice in 167 B.C. and profaned the temple by introducing a holy object sacred to the god Zeus, to which he sacrificed a pig, abhorrent to Jewish religion. This holy object has been suggested to be a meteorite that became a cult object that the Jews referred to as "an abomination that causes desolation" (9:27).

Such actions against the formal worship of God's people was far more than an affront against the people; it was an attack against heaven itself. Antiochus indeed took a stand against the "Prince of princes," that is, against God. But such arrogance can only lead to one conclusion: utter defeat. The defeat of the small horn is announced simply and definitively: "Yet he will be destroyed, but not by human power" (v. 25). The latter clause should not be taken to mean that no human agency was involved in the downfall of Antiochus, but rather that the ultimate power behind the Maccabean freedom fighters was God himself, who gave them the victory and allowed them to restore the temple to its former function as a center for worship of the true God.

Finally, the angelic interpreter reaffirms the time frame of the suffering and its end: "The vision of the evenings and mornings that has been given you is true, but seal up the vision, for it concerns the distant future" (v. 26). Interestingly, even in historical retrospect we cannot be dogmatic about the meaning of the 2300 evenings and mornings. Above we have commented that there are at least two equally plausible ways to interpret this number: 2300 days (its most natural reading) or 2300 morning and evening sacrifices (i.e., 1150 days). The second interpretation can be supported by the context and a knowledge of the sacrificial system in Israel.

It is also possible to fit both numbers, approximately, into the time of its fulfillment in the middle of the second century B.C. After all, when does the period start, with the prohibition of sacrifice in late 167 or earlier with the removal of Onias III from the high priesthood in 171? And when does it end, with the reconsecration of the high priesthood in 164 or in 163 when Antiochus died? Or, contrary to both of these literalistic interpretations, is the number symbolic?¹⁸

In the final analysis, we cannot be dogmatic. The number is given not so much so that those who read Daniel's sixth-century prognostications in the second century could compute when the suffering would stop as much as to assure them that God had things under control. Furthermore, the number indicates with certainty that there would be a stopping point to the persecution, even if that number could not be computed into a definite date in the calendar as they knew it. As we will comment in the next sections, this number is typical of chronological numbers throughout the book of Daniel. They may not be used for date settings or for establishing apocalyptic calendars. Moreover, if we cannot be certain of numbers used in prophecies that have already been fulfilled, how likely can we figure out the numbers that point to times in the far distant future?

The prophecy ends with Daniel "exhausted" and confused. Though clear in many regards, the vision would have astounded someone living in the sixth century B.C., where Media, Persia, and Greece were relatively small points on the map. Not only that, but we have seen in regard to the 2300 days that even today, centuries after the fulfillment, certain elements are still not clear to us.

Bridging Contexts

IF WE HAVE been reading through the book of Daniel, by now its major theme is well ingrained in our minds: In spite of present appearances, God is in control and will triumph against the forces of evil. After reading chapter 8, we can readily see how this is the case here. We will spell it out more clearly in the light of the six important points that we anticipated were present to some degree in each of the last six chapters of the book.¹⁹

(1) The horror of human evil is especially concentrated in the state. Like chapter 7, Daniel 8 paints a picture of world history using animal imagery. A goat fights a ram. The goat's single horn is broken and is replaced by four horns. From one of the four a small horn sprouts and assumes god-like proportions. These images clearly represent political entities, nation states that will, from Daniel's sixth-century perspective, rise up in the future. They are all characterized by violence. The ram dominates other unspecified animals; the goat tramples the ram. Its horn is broken off, and the cycle of violence goes on and on.

The focus, however, is on the violence of the small horn, which is directed against God and his hosts. The small horn attacks the formal worship of God's people, and thus this violence is a new level of horror that cannot go unanswered.

- (2) A specific time of deliverance is announced. Daniel 8 gives a limit to the time in which the small horn can work its devastation: 2300 evenings and mornings. We noted above the difficulty of determining the precise length of time this represents. In Daniel's words, "it was beyond understanding" (v. 27). It is this theme we will explore in greater detail in the Contemporary Significance section, so we reserve further discussion until that time.
- (3) Repentance leads to deliverance. This theme is absent or at least subdued in this chapter. There is ambiguity in the sentence in verse 12, "Because of rebellion, the host Lof the saints and the daily sacrifice were given over to it [the horn]." Is the rebellion that causes the turmoil the rebellion of the people who are thus punished by the small horn, who would then be God's unknowing tool of judgment? Or is the rebellion the assault of the small horn on God, which has evil consequences for his people? We cannot know for sure, but even if the former (which I think is less likely) is true, it is still the case that the present chapter (as opposed esp. to ch. 9) focuses more on the atrocities directed against God and his hosts than on any sin that holds God's people culpable for their suffering.

(4) A cosmic war stands behind human conflict. In historical retrospect, we can assert with great certainty that the climactic battle described in this chapter as instigated by the small horn is the persecution of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV against observant Jewish people in the mid-second century B.C. However, the prophetic description of this future event makes it clear that more is going on behind the scenes. We await chapter 10 for an even more dramatic disclosure, but we already get an overture to the theme that a spiritual conflict stands behind the earthly one. It is not Antiochus versus the Maccabees alone, but it is a little horn who presumes to be a god who fights against the Prince of princes and his starry hosts. A cosmic battle is ultimately at issue here. A fuller discussion of this theme is found in chapter 10.

With the god-like pretension of Antiochus, we also see how readily he can become a symbol for all those who in their overweening pride seek to replace God on the throne of the universe. Of course, Satan was the first to attempt this rebellion against his Creator, but Christians know that someone is coming who will seek to replace God and will help instigate the events that lead to God's final redemptive intrusion into human events. Later, we will explore how Antiochus becomes an apt symbol for the one Christians know as the Antichrist.

(5) Judgment is certain for those who resist God and oppress his people. The vision itself ends with a rather subdued statement of the downfall of the small horn. The bulk of the description of the small horn's career is on its seeming successes. It is only in answer to the question "how long" this wicked devastation will be allowed to continue that the angel says simply, "It will take 2,300 evenings and mornings; then the sanctuary will be reconsecrated" (v. 14).

As already noted, the statement is forceful, but still not greatly developed. The small horn, Antiochus and all he represents, will be certainly and definitively destroyed, but "not by human power" (v. 25). That is, God himself will ultimately bring Antiochus down.

(6) God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense. "The sanctuary will be reconsecrated" (v. 14)—stated as a simple statement. When God defeats the forces of evil represented in Antiochus, it will result in a restoration of the temple.

The temple was more than a building; it was a symbol of God's presence with his people, hence a source of life and hope. Its desecration at the hands of Antiochus was an assault against God and cause for despair among the faithful. But the restoration of the temple meant a new life, the possibility of intense fellowship with God once again. We will see in chapter 12 that this too anticipates even greater realities than temple worship. There we learn that the faithful can hope for resurrection and a blessed eternal life in the presence of God beyond death itself.

Contemporary Significance

OUR STRATEGY FOR treating the major themes that echo throughout the second half of Daniel calls on us to treat the second one ("the announcement of a specific time of deliverance") here. For a treatment of the other five themes, consult the Contemporary Significance sections of chapters 7, 9, 10, 11, and 12.

Each unit in the apocalyptic section of Daniel contains some kind of chronological notice. In chapter 7, we learn that the saints will be handed over to the climactic king for "a time, times and half a time" (7:25). In chapter 9, we get the infamous "seventy weeks of years" (9:25–27). In chapter 12 (chs. 10–12 is a single unit), we read the enigmatic statement that the time between the abolishment of the sacrifice and the setting up of the abomination of desolation will be "1,290 days," followed by the even more enigmatic statement, "Blessed is the one who waits for and reaches the end of the 1,335 days" (12:11–12). While each of these passages will be treated in its own contexts, here we discuss the general issue of how these passages apply to us today.

Numbers in apocalyptic literature. Daniel is not the only apocalyptic book that contains provocative calendrical numbers. Most notable is the controversial reference in Revelation 20:3 to the thousand-year binding of Satan. The debate over this passage has caused debate among sincere Christians for many years. Is it to be understood as a literal millennium to begin at some date in the future, or is it a symbolic number standing for the period of time between the first and second coming of Christ? These two camps are known as amillennialism and premillennialism.

Our comments will have ramifications for this debate, though we will not address it directly. Our concern here is to inquire what effect Daniel's chronological statements are supposed to have on us living on the eve of the third millennium A.D.? Are they pointers to the date of the return of Christ or do they intend to communicate another message to us?

Date-setting the Return. It is important to address this issue at the present time because the press is filled with reports that apocalyptic speculation is on the rise because of the shift of millennium. Further, the church is constantly bombarded with claims that someone has finally figured out the difficult apocalyptic numbers and has determined that we are living in the period of the end. We hear often that there is only a limited amount of time before Christ returns and history will come to a dramatic end, which is usually characterized as a period of violence.

In early 1994, I debated Harold Camping of Family Radio. Mr. Camping had faithfully been teaching the Bible virtually every night for the past thirty years. He had built up a faithful following over those years by offering biblical teaching on many important theological and practical issues. While his teaching could be characterized as overly dogmatic on certain controversial issues like divorce, he did not have a reputation for the sensational. In addition, he was an advocate of Reformed theology, from which school of thought usually emanated rather reserved teaching about the end times. Thus, when he published a book in 1993 in which he claimed to be able to unseal (Dan. 8:26; 12:9) the apocalyptic teaching about the time of the return of Christ, it generated a furor in churches not used to such speculation.²⁰

At the time I was teaching a seminar on "How to Interpret Prophecy" with Ray Dillard, my colleague at Westminster Theological Seminary. After the publication of Camping's book, we started to get a lot of anxious questions about the validity of his claims. Moreover, people in my own church became intrigued and a few even were persuaded by his arguments that Christ was going to return in September 1994.

It quickly became obvious to me that this was more than an interpretive debate. It had a dramatic effect on people's lives. One person I know drove his credit card balance to the max and got into serious financial trouble. His response? "Who cares! In a few months, Christ is coming again, so I don't have to worry about not paying my bills." Another friend was having serious marital problems. His wife had left him and the children. When I went on a pastoral call to visit him, I asked him if he had made any attempts to speak to his wife about their problems. His response? "No, I don't need to. In a matter of months, Christ is coming again and my problems will disappear." These are just two of the horror stories that I heard over the months preceding September 1994 from those who were persuaded that Mr. Camping had found the key to the difficult chronological notices in the apocalyptic teaching of the Bible, including Daniel.

When I debated Mr. Camping, it was May 1994, about four months from the date he had put forward as the time Christ would return. When I arrived at the location for the debate, I was completely floored. I was used to doing seminars on the Bible and getting good-sized groups of people interested to learn more about principles for interpreting prophecy, but I was not prepared for the huge group that had assembled to hear a discussion with the man who said that he had the date for the return of Christ figured out.

Of course, I could understand that Christians would be vitally interested in when their Lord was going to return again to "wipe away every tear" (Rev. 7:17; cf. 21:4), but didn't they know that the Jesus they were expecting also taught clearly, "No one knows about that day or hour, not even the angels in heaven, not the Son, but only the Father" (Mark 13:32)? How could some man or woman claim to know what Jesus himself said was hidden from him?

In one sense I was surprised, but in another I was not. I am, of course, using Mr. Camping as an example of a phenomenon that has happened again and again throughout church history. Countless claims have been made that someone has figured out that the Bible teaches an exact time for Christ's return. As a matter of fact, one scholar's research has numbered over two hundred such claims since 1945 alone!²¹ Thus, my anecdote must not be taken as a critique of Mr. Camping alone but of the whole enterprise of using apocalyptic as a tool for figuring out when Christ is coming again.

Date-setting is not an appropriate contemporary use of apocalyptic literature. That is the burden of my argument in this section.

Misuses of apocalyptic. Before continuing with my argument, let me point out that there are two misuses of apocalyptic in this way. (1) Mr. Camping represents the claim that one can use the Bible's apocalyptic chronology as a calendar to argue for a precise date for Christ's return. In answer to my challenge based on Mark 13:32, Mr. Camping coolly responded, "I don't know the day or the hour, I know the month and the year." This statement, of course, is a complete misunderstanding of Jesus' intention in that verse.

Now we might wrongly believe that this approach to the issue takes care of itself in the long run, and indeed it sometimes does—eventually. When I spoke to the group in May (which was mostly made up of his already convinced followers), I began by saying, "I know that I can't convince most of you today, but I want you to have something to think about in October." But when October came, Mr. Camping, in his radio broadcasts, while shaken, held out for the calendar year. When 1994 turned into 1995, he suddenly had the insight that the Bible meant the "Jewish year," which ended in the spring of 1995. When the second half of 1995 came, he cited the example of Jonah, who announced the demise of Nineveh only to have God spare that city. In other words, he wasn't wrong; God in his compassion for the lost just delayed his return.

Similar strategies of reinterpretation may be seen throughout history, perhaps most notably after the apparent failure of William Miller's prediction of Christ's return sometime during the Jewish year that ran from March 21, 1843 to March 21, 1844. When this date passed, a slight miscalculation was discovered, which led to a new date, October 22, 1844. There was tremendous disappointment when that date passed, but Miller's influence did not. Instead, a whole new movement developed from this Baptist minister's predictions. A group withdrew from the mainstream church to form another denomination, which we know today as the Adventist movement. Even today Adventist theologians argue that something important happened in 1843, a kind of anticipatory fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy in Daniel 9.²²

(2) But there is another type of misuse of these materials that must also be addressed. Only rarely does someone pick a precise date for the fulfillment of these chronological statements in Daniel and Revelation. The more typical pattern is the claim that the Bible teaches that, while we cannot pick a date, all the signs are pointing to the end within our lifetime. In our own time, the most well-known advocate of this reading of apocalyptic literature is Hal Lindsey.

As a senior in high school and not yet a believer, the first Christian book I ever read was Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth. Nowhere does the author pick a date. He wisely listens to Christ's teaching on that point. However, one cannot read his book without thinking that Christ must return before the mid–1970s. Everything was poised for the end of existence. Nuclear arsenals were just waiting for the button to be pressed. World food resources could not last more than a few more years. The environment would kill us before a few years were out. The end was near; the signs of the time were in full play.

This leads to an important issue. The Jesus who told us we could not know the day or the hour also told us to look for the signs of the time (cf. Mark 13). The latter days will be marked by earthquakes, wars and rumors of wars, false messiahs, and the appearance of the antichrist. When the gospel has been preached to all the nations, then we will be on the edge of the consummation. Such indications will alert us to the fact that Christ is about to return.

Perhaps of all the events in recent history that most make us think that our time is that special time has been the rebirth of the nation of Israel, the location of so many great redemptive events. I vividly remember my first visit to Israel in 1976, overlooking the Megiddo Valley (biblical Armageddon). The tour guide pointed out the military airfield below and commented on the fact that before the first generation of the new nation passed, the great final conflagration would take place right there in the valley below us. It is significant for me to think that the year I am writing these comments is the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of the nation of Israel, and most have understood the reference to a generation as being no more than fifty years.

But should the signs of the times be understood in this way? If so, what sense did it make for Jesus in the same breath to tell his followers (Mark 13:33–36):

Be on guard! Be alert! You do not know when that time will come. It's like a man going away: He leaves his house and puts his servants in charge, each with his assigned task, and tells the one at the door to keep watch.

Therefore keep watch because you do not know when the owner of the house will come back—whether in the evening, or at midnight, or when the rooster crows, or at dawn. If he comes suddenly, do not let him find you sleeping. What I say to you, I say to everyone: "Watch!"

To put it bluntly, why should they—why should we—watch unless we see the signs of the time?

But note that every generation has seen the signs of the time. This is why we are tempted, particularly when we have not listened to Jesus' clear teaching about not knowing the precise time, to think that our time is that special time.

I will not address every one of those signs,²³ but what age has not experienced earthquakes, wars, and rumors of wars? If there seem to be more wars and more earthquakes, could that not be because global communication is now possible and more immediate? What age has not recognized the Antichrist among them? After all, there are a lot of people, some of them satanically evil and powerful, who are "against Christ."²⁴ And what is the criterion for reaching every nation (or, as some argue, "people group")? Is it when one person, or more than 50 percent, or everyone in a nation/people group has heard? These are unanswerable questions.

The signs of the time do not intend to tell us that we are living in the shadow of Christ's return, but rather to remind us that we live in the last days, the days between the first and second coming of Christ. When we hear of an earthquake, we are not to say, "The time is nigh." Rather, we are to remind ourselves that we are still on this side of the consummation. We are to remind ourselves to be prepared, because Christ will appear "like a thief in the night" (1 Thess. 5:2).

That leads us back to the function of the highly symbolic numbers in Daniel and elsewhere, which are so difficult to figure out. Their purpose is not for date-setting but for comfort. They remind us that God knows what he is doing. God is sovereign and has set a limit on how long the present evil world will oppress us. These facts should comfort us by reminding us that God is in control of the situation.

I submit for our consideration that the misuse of these apocalyptic dates is an attempt to wrest control from God and place it firmly in our own sinful grasp. But the result is disruption in the church and in our lives. Such vain speculation leads, as in the case of the people I mentioned above, to a complete disregard for present realities. God calls us to live in the present while waiting with hope for the future.

Daniel 9:1-27

¹In the first year of Darius son of Xerxes (a Mede by descent), who was made ruler over the Babylonian kingdom—²in the first year of his reign, I, Daniel, understood from the Scriptures, according to the word of the LORD given to Jeremiah the prophet, that the desolation of Jerusalem would last seventy years. ³So I turned to the Lord God and pleaded with him in prayer and petition, in fasting, and in sackcloth and ashes.

⁴I prayed to the LORD my God and confessed:

"O Lord, the great and awesome God, who keeps his covenant of love with all who love him and obey his commands, ⁵we have sinned and done wrong. We have been wicked and have rebelled; we have turned away from your commands and laws. ⁶We have not listened to your servants the prophets, who spoke in your name to our kings, our princes and our fathers, and to all the people of the land.

⁷"Lord, you are righteous, but this day we are covered with shame—the men of Judah and people of Jerusalem and all Israel, both near and far, in all the countries where you have scattered us because of our unfaithfulness to you. ⁸O LORD, we and our kings, our princes and our fathers are covered with shame because we have sinned against you. ⁹The Lord our God is merciful and forgiving, even though we have rebelled against him; ¹⁰we have not obeyed the LORD our God or kept the laws he gave us through his servants the prophets. ¹¹All Israel has transgressed your law and turned away, refusing to obey you.

"Therefore the curses and sworn judgments written in the Law of Moses, the servant of God, have been poured out on us, because we have sinned against you. ¹²You have fulfilled the words spoken against us and against our rulers by bringing upon us great disaster. Under the whole heaven nothing has ever been done like what has been done to Jerusalem. ¹³Just as it is written in the Law of Moses, all this disaster has come upon us, yet we have not sought the favor of the LORD our God by turning from our sins and giving attention to your truth. ¹⁴The LORD did not hesitate to bring the disaster upon us, for the LORD our God is righteous in everything he does; yet we have not obeyed him.

15"Now, O Lord our God, who brought your people out of Egypt with a mighty hand and who made for yourself a name that endures to this day, we have sinned, we have done wrong. ¹⁶O Lord, in keeping with all your righteous acts, turn away your anger and your wrath from Jerusalem, your city, your holy hill. Our sins and the iniquities of our fathers have made Jerusalem and your people an object of scorn to all those around us.

¹⁷"Now, our God, hear the prayers and petitions of your servant. For your sake, O Lord, look with favor on your desolate sanctuary. ¹⁸Give ear, O God, and hear; open your eyes and see the desolation of the city that bears your Name. We do not make requests of you because we are righteous, but because of your great mercy. ¹⁹O Lord, listen! O Lord, forgive! O Lord, hear and act! For your sake, O my God, do not delay, because your city and your people bear your Name."

²⁰While I was speaking and praying, confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel and making my request to the LORD my God for his holy hill—
²¹while I was still in prayer, Gabriel, the man I had seen in the earlier vision, came to me in swift flight about the time of the evening sacrifice. ²²He instructed me and said to me, "Daniel, I have now come to give you insight and understanding. ²³As soon as you began to pray, an answer was given, which I have come to tell you, for you are highly esteemed. Therefore, consider the message and understand the vision:

²⁴"Seventy 'sevens' are decreed for your people and your holy city to finish transgression, to put an end to sin, to atone for wickedness, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up vision and prophecy and to anoint the most holy.

²⁵"Know and understand this: From the issuing of the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem until the Anointed One, the ruler, comes, there will be seven 'sevens,' and sixty-two 'sevens.' It will be rebuilt with streets and a trench, but in times of trouble. ²⁶After the sixty-two 'sevens,' the Anointed One will be cut off and will have nothing. The people of the ruler who will come will destroy the city and the sanctuary. The end will come like a flood: War will continue until the end, and desolations have been decreed. ²⁷He will confirm a covenant with many for one 'seven.' In the middle of the 'seven' he will put an end to sacrifice and offering. And on a wing of the temple he will set up an abomination that causes desolation, until the end that is decreed is poured out on him."

Original Meaning

DANIEL 9 BEGINS like the other chapters in its immediate context by announcing the time when the events described in it take place. It is the first year of Darius the Mede, the one whom we understand to be the ruler of Babylonia after the Persians defeated the native dynasty represented by Belshazzar. The year, then, is 539 B.C.

While the introduction to the chapter is familiar, its contents are unusual for the book. The immediate context is full of apocalyptic visions, yet here we encounter a prayer stimulated by Daniel's reading of Scripture. The prophet is reading the letter of Jeremiah and notes his declaration that the Exile will last seventy years. This insight leads him to turn to God with a prayer of confession.

Some scholars feel that the prayer fits awkwardly in its context.² However, such concerns arise only when one has a rigid view of the composition of a biblical book. That the apocalyptic visions are interrupted by a prayer is not at all illogical to the context. In fact, note that Daniel's prayer leads to the appearance of Gabriel, who answers his prayer with an explanation of the seventy years (vv. 20–27), which is a typical way in which numbers are treated in apocalyptic.

Some scholars insist, however, that the context, in which Daniel is struggling with the interpretation of Scripture, demands not the prayer of confession that appears in the chapter, but rather a prayer of illumination. After all, that is what Gabriel provides, an explanation of the Jeremiah passage. But again, Daniel knows that the end of the Exile does not come automatically; it requires confession and repentance. That is the intention of his prayer.

Other scholars feel that Daniel's confession represents a view of the suffering of the exiles that is alien to the book. It is true that the book in the main deals with the tribulations that the foreign oppressors were pressing on God's people. But a faithful Israelite like Daniel would know where the true blame of the Exile rested—not on Babylon, but on the rebellious people of God themselves. Indeed, we observed in the first few verses of the book that this Exile was not an autonomous act on the part of the godless Babylonians. God was behind the process that brought the Israelites under their control. This strongly implies an understanding that the Exile was the result of Israel's sin. Furthermore, Daniel is reading Jeremiah, the prophet who made it clear why the Babylonians won the day—Israel's breaking of the covenant.

Scholars often refer to the theology expressed in Daniel's prayer as Deuteronomic, that is, as reflecting the theology of Deuteronomy.³ This Old Testament book is in the form of a report about the covenant relationship between God and his people. A covenant is similar to a treaty.⁴ In simple terms, God makes certain promises to his people, and in response they are to obey the laws he announces to them. Essential to a covenant are the blessings and curses: If God's people obey the laws God gives them, he will bless them with security, fertility, and prosperity (Deut. 28:1–14); but if they disobey the law—in particular, if they depart from the worship of the true God—they will be cursed with (among other things) oppression by enemies and exile. Typical is the curse in 28:64–68, a passage that clearly anticipates the Babylonian Exile:

Then the LORD will scatter you among all nations, from one end of the earth to the other. There you will worship other gods—gods of wood and stone, which neither you nor your fathers have known. Among those nations you will find no repose, no resting place for the sole of your foot. There the LORD will give you an anxious mind, eyes weary with longing, and a despairing heart. You will live in constant suspense, filled with dread both night and day, never sure of your life. In the morning you will say, "If only it were evening!" and in the evening, "If only it were morning!"—because of the terror that will fill your hearts and the sights that your eyes will see. The LORD will send you back in ships to Egypt on a journey I said you should never make again. There you will offer yourselves for sale to your enemies as male and female slaves, but no one will buy you.

From Daniel's perspective, centuries after the writing of Deuteronomy Israel suffered for having broken the covenant and were now experiencing the curses of the covenant.

But Daniel also realized that this was not the end of the story. God is merciful and forgiving. Indeed, in another relevant passage of Scripture, the formula for restoration is clearly put forth. First Kings 8 narrates the dedication of the newly built temple. At that time, Solomon offered a prayer in which he recognized that a time might come when Israel's sin would lead to their defeat at the hands of an enemy (1 Kings 8:33–34, 46–51):

When your people Israel have been defeated by an enemy because they have sinned against you, and when they turn back to you and confess your name, praying and making supplication to you in this temple, then hear from heaven and forgive the sin of your people Israel and bring them back to the land you gave to their fathers....

When they sin against you—for there is no one who does not sin—and you become angry with them and give them over to the enemy, who takes them captive to his own land, far away or near; and if they have a change of heart in the land where they are held captive, and repent and plead with you in the land of their conquerors and say, "We have sinned, we have done wrong, we have acted wickedly"; and if they turn back to you with all their heart and soul in the land of their enemies who took them captive, and pray to you toward the land you gave their fathers, toward the city you have chosen and the temple I have built for your Name; then from heaven, your dwelling place, hear their prayer and their pleas, and uphold their cause. And forgive your people, who have sinned against you; forgive all the offenses they have committed against you, and cause their conquerors to show them mercy; for they are your people and your inheritance, whom you brought out of Egypt, out of that iron-smelting furnace.

Solomon is here reflecting the theology of Deuteronomy. Daniel does not cite Solomon's prayer; he may not even be thinking of it, but he certainly reflects its theology. In this sense, Daniel represents a Deuteronomic theology. And what else would we expect? Daniel's thinking is founded on God's revelation, which includes Deuteronomy, Kings, and Jeremiah.

Interest in this chapter has usually bypassed the prayer for the more enigmatic prophecy of the seventy weeks. This is unfortunate, for the prayer contains much rich theology and important practical application to those of us reading it today. The seventy weeks has amassed an incredible bibliography and a bewildering array of interpretations. We will do our best to cut through the maze to get at the heart of the teaching of that passage without getting bogged down in esoterica.

Our discussion of the chapter will be divided into five parts: (1) Preparation for prayer (9:1–4a); (2) invocation and confession (9:4b–10); (3) God's punishment (9:11–14); (4) appeal for mercy (9:15–19); (5) the prophecy of the seventy weeks (9:20–27).

Preparation for Prayer (9:1–4a)

As IS TYPICAL of the book of Daniel, the chapter begins with a chronological notice. It is the first year of Darius, "who was made ruler over the Babylonian kingdom" (v. 1). This Darius had forcibly replaced Belshazzar (coregent of Nabonidus) on the throne and was likely a subordinate ruler of Cyrus of Persia (for an extended discussion of the question of the identity of Darius the Mede, see comments on ch. 6).

The significance of the mention of Darius's first year (539 B.C.) was that this was the year in which the Persians defeated the Babylonians, whose empire, under Nebuchadnezzar, had defeated and exiled Judah some decades before. Darius's first year as king of Babylon would have coincided with the first year of Cyrus as the great king of the Persian empire—also the year, therefore, that witnessed the decree to allow some Judeans to return to their homeland.

Daniel's prayer seems to have taken place in anticipation of this decree. His witness to the fall of Babylon may have caused him to turn to the Scriptures with new eyes.

Rarely do we see such an explicit reference from one biblical book to another as we see here with Daniel's appeal to Jeremiah. Some scholars are unwilling to speak of a closed prophetic canon or an authoritative Scripture at this point,⁵ but it is certainly hard to avoid the implication of the latter. What Jeremiah has written, after all, is referred to as the "word of the LORD." Here we see the equation between the prophet's words and the word of the one who commissioned him. Reading Jeremiah's words sets off Daniel's passionate appeal in verses 4–19.

But what did Daniel read in Jeremiah? Though verse numbers are not given, Daniel certainly had passages like Jeremiah 25:11–12; 29:10 in mind:

This whole country will become a desolate wasteland, and these nations will serve the king of Babylon seventy years.

"But when the seventy years are fulfilled, I will punish the king of Babylon and his nation, the land of the Babylonians, for their guilt," declares the LORD, "and will make it desolate forever."

This is what the LORD says, "When seventy years are completed for Babylon, I will come to you and fulfill my gracious promise to bring you back to this place."

In essence these passages teach that the king of Babylon will dominate the ancient Near East (including Judah) for seventy years, after which time Babylon itself will come to an end. In the first year of Darius, Babylon has come to an end as a world power, being replaced by Persia. Daniel recognizes this as the time when the Exile may come to an end.

Note that seventy years, counting backward from 539, is 609 B.C. What happened in 609? As far as Judah and the Exile is concerned—nothing.⁶ The first incursion we know about is the one mentioned in Daniel 1:1–2, dated to around 605 B.C. Is seventy years a round number for the period of 605 to 539? Perhaps. However, seventy also suggests a symbolic number being seven multiplied by ten, two numbers of completeness.⁷ Seventy may also be seen as the approximate or symbolic number for a lifetime.⁸

The interpretation of this number becomes even more complex, however, when we examine two later biblical books as they reflect on Jeremiah's prophecy of seventy years of exile. (1) 2 Chronicles 36:20–22 also refers to Jeremiah's seventy years. The Chronicler draws an interesting connection to the Sabbath rests of the land. Leviticus 25:1–7 and 26:31–35, 43 command the Israelites to allow their land to rest every seven years, which apparently they rarely, if ever, did. He then interprets the Exile as a divinely imposed period to make up for the seventy missed sabbatical years. But more telling for our interpretation of Daniel 9, it appears as if the Chronicler understood the seventy years to begin in 586 B.C., the year in which Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the temple and completed the deportation process. He also understood the Exile to end in 539 B.C. with Cyrus's decree, thus clearly taking the number symbolically.

(2) The other relevant passage is Zechariah 1:12, where the prophet reports the plaintive cry of an angel who asks: "How long will you withhold mercy from Jerusalem and from the towns of Judah, which you have been angry with these seventy years?" According to Zechariah the seventy years are apparently still in process in 519 B.C. (the second year of a later Darius).

When we compare these passages and reflect on the number itself, we reach the conclusion that the number is not literal, nor even referring to one specific period of time. This should not concern us; it is the predominant way in which numbers are used in apocalyptic. The recognition of this fact should also prepare us for the even more extravagant use of numbers later in the chapter.

In any case, it is with a scripturally inspired sense that the Exile is coming to a close that Daniel turns to the Lord in prayer. It is significant that only in the context of this prayer is the covenant name Yahweh ("LORD" in NIV) used. This is appropriate in a prayer that appeals to God's covenant promises to forgive and restore his people on the basis of their confession.

Daniel's preparation for prayer indicates the kind of prayer that will follow. He fasts and puts on sackcloth and ashes, all of which are actions that indicate his deep sorrow and grief. Towner is right to identify the following prayer as a "prose prayer of penitence" and to cite its close connections with prayers found in Ezra 9:6–15; Nehemiah 1:5–11 and 9:6–37. They are "all penitential in character and all containing elements of ascription, confession, and petition."

Invocation and Confession (9:4b–10)

THE PRAYER BEGINS by calling on God's name. Indeed, it paints a powerful picture of the Lord, especially in contrast to his people. Daniel acknowledges him as "great and awesome" as well as faithful to the covenant. The latter is most to the point of the prayer. As explained above, the theology of this chapter is based on the theology of the covenant, particularly the Mosaic covenant as recorded in Deuteronomy. Daniel appeals to God as the one who keeps his covenant with all who obey the laws associated with that covenant. He characterizes the covenant as a "covenant of love." The word here translated "love" is the rich term ḥesed, which is the affection that leads to covenant faithfulness on God's part. He does not quickly punish his people, and he stands ready to bless them when they obey his laws.

However, Daniel confesses that God's people have not obeyed his commands, but have rebelled against him instead. They have not listened to the warnings of the prophets who were sent to God's people to get them to change their attitudes and behavior to conform to God's will. The prophets are like the lawyers of the covenant. When the covenant is broken, they appear in order to accuse the people with the ultimate intention of restoring their love and fidelity to God. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and many others were used by God to carry the message of warning and repentance, but they went largely unheeded.

The prophets were sent, according to Daniel, to all strata of society—from kings to common people. None of them, however, responded. Rather, they persisted in their foolish and dangerous rebellion. In the next few verses of the confession, Daniel marks a contrast between the sin of the people and the mercy of God. God is faithful; his people are rebellious. The prophet is brutally honest in his acknowledgment of the responsibility of God's people for their present dire condition. They are in exile because they have rebelled against the covenant God made with them through Moses.

God's Punishment (9:11–14)

In the Next section of his prayer, Daniel draws a direct connection between the sin of the people and their present suffering. We cited above two of the curses Daniel has in mind, but there are more (see Deut. 27–28). Between the Law of Moses and the Prophets, God's people had no excuse. They knew what the consequences of their actions would be. But somehow they rationalized it. Perhaps they grew presumptuous because of God's long patience with them. They would sin without immediate punishment, so they began to doubt that God would really follow through with his threats. Jeremiah 7:1–29, the so-called "temple sermon" of Jeremiah, charges Israel with presumption because of the presence of the temple in the city. They wrongly reasoned that if God's residence was the temple, there would be no way that an enemy, even one as mighty as Babylon, could defeat their city.

They were safe as long as God lived in Jerusalem, and since the temple was immovable, they were safe forever.

What they did not consider was the possibility that God would abandon his temple (Ezek. 9–11). They further did not reckon with the possibility God himself would turn against them and lead the Babylonian army into the streets of Jerusalem (Jer. 21:3–7). Indeed, the horror of the resulting destruction of Jerusalem reverberates through the biblical literature of the exilic period, as seen in Lamentations 2:2–5:

Without pity the Lord has swallowed up all the dwellings of Jacob; in his wrath he has torn down the strongholds of the Daughter of Judah. He has brought her kingdom and its princes down to the ground in dishonor. In fierce anger he has cut off every horn of Israel. He has withdrawn his right hand at the approach of the enemy. He has burned in Jacob like a flaming fire that consumes everything around it. Like an enemy he has strung his bow; his right hand is ready. Like a foe he has slain all who were pleasing to the eye; he has poured out his wrath like fire on the tent of the Daughter of Zion. The Lord is like an enemy; he has swallowed up Israel. He has swallowed up all her palaces and destroyed her strongholds. He has multiplied mourning and lamentation for the Daughter of Judah.

The description in Lamentations goes on and on; we cannot fathom the horror that the faithful felt at the destruction of their beloved city and their temple.

Though horrible, however, Daniel does acknowledge again that God was right in what he had done. The destruction of Jerusalem and the Exile of Judah were not acts of an arbitrary God, but rather the consequences of the sinful attitudes and actions of God's people, about which they were repeatedly warned.

Appeal for Mercy (9:15–19)

Daniel has been praying not just on his own behalf, but as the representative of the people. He has not confessed his own sins, but rather the sins of the nation. From that foundation, he now asks God to show mercy to his people and restore the destroyed city. We noted above from 1 Kings 8 that restoration was possible after divine punishment, but it required this kind of acknowledgment of responsibility on the part of the people.

Here the prophet calls on God as the One who delivered his people out of Egypt. The Exodus was a pivotal event in the life of God's people. It defined them as a nation. Through it, God freed them from slavery and brought them into the Promised Land. The prophets before Daniel saw an analogy between the Exodus and the future deliverance that would free them from the shackles of the Exile (cf. Isa. 40:3–5; Hos. 2:14–15). In essence, the return from the Exile would be a sort of second Exodus.

Though the plea for God's mercy follows the confession and could not proceed without it, it is wrong to think that the confession is the basis of God's restoration. Daniel knows that the people are still sinful and if there is any hope for them, it is in God's righteousness and not their own (vv. 16, 18). Daniel's appeal is ultimately based not on the people's plight but on the reputation of God himself.

The Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks (9:20–27)

Daniel's prayer gives the impression of completeness, ending as it does with an impassioned plea for God to hear the prayer and forgive his people without delay (v. 19). The prophet is still in a prayerful frame of mind, perhaps continuing with urgent appeals to God to answer the prayer, when he is suddenly interrupted by Gabriel, the angel who interpreted the vision of the previous chapter. Gabriel may well have had the task of interpreter among the angels of the Lord.

We must remember that Daniel's prayer for forgiveness and restoration was motivated by his reading of Jeremiah's prophecy that the Exile would last seventy years. Gabriel's answer to Daniel's prayer is an interpretation of the seventy years in a way that seems to extend its purview. Gabriel apparently suggests that the end of the seventy-year exile begins a process, one that will last for seventy "sevens," or weeks of years—usually understood as 490 years.

We will begin our exploration of Gabriel's speech by paraphrasing it without attempting to relate it to the future or historical events. Daniel has prayed for forgiveness and restoration, and Gabriel now communicates the heavenly answer by reinterpreting the seventy years as seventy "sevens." During this period six actions will be completed: (1) the finishing of transgression, (2) the end of sin, (3) the atonement of the wicked, (4) the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, (5) the sealing up of vision and prophecy, and (6) the anointing of the most holy (v. 24). The accomplishment of these six actions certainly sounds like an answer to Daniel's prayer, but they are being pushed off to the future (the force of the seventy "sevens" to be explained below). They are, in the words of J. J. Collins, an "eschatological ideal."

The first two actions describe the end of sin, presumably on the part of God's people; after all, that was what Daniel's prayer called for. However, it may also encompass the sins of all people, including the sins of the nations described as beasts in chapters 7 and 8. The third action, "to atone for wickedness," emphasizes the theme of the first two, the eradication of sin. But whereas the first two simply describe the cessation of sinful activity, this third action implies that God removes the consequences of already committed sinful behavior.

While the first three actions describe the eradication of the negative, the next three are more positive in focus. The first is clearly positive, though of a general nature and hard to specify: The completion of the seventy sevens will see the introduction of "everlasting righteousness." The second, the sealing of vision and prophecy, is sometimes misunderstood as a sealing away. But sealing in its ancient context is better understood as a mark of approval, an authentication of the prophetic word. Perhaps in this context it implies the act of authentication, that is, the ultimate fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy. The last, and perhaps the culmination of the six actions, is the anointing of "the most holy." Some take the reference as pointing to the temple and its cleansing by the Maccabean rebels after being profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes in the middle of the second century B.C. Another ancient tradition, however, takes the reference not to a place but to a person—the Messiah.

These six actions take place during the entire period of seventy "sevens." They describe the eradication of evil and the establishment of righteousness. In the present, Daniel and his companions know an imperfect world, but in the future things will be wonderful.

Far from concluding his speech, Gabriel continues by taking a more nuanced look at the seventy "sevens." He divides the period into parts, charting a kind of forward-looking history of the seventy "sevens." In essence, he divides the entire period into three parts (vv. 25–27). (1) The first seven "sevens" and (2) the next sixty-two "sevens" are in one sense treated as a single unit—though in another obvious way as two—and encompass the period between the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem and the coming of "the Anointed One." We are already used to this enigmatic way of referring to future time periods, so we are not surprised at the questions that arise from these numbers. Why exactly is the first seven "sevens" separated from the next sixty-two? Apparently, we are to think of that shorter period as having a kind of integrity of its own, but what marks its ending point? Which decree of many that we know about is in Gabriel's mind? Who is "the Anointed One"? We will address these questions below.

With the phrase "streets and a trench" (v. 25a) the passage intends to communicate that Jerusalem will be completely restored and that this restoration will take place in an atmosphere of "trouble" (v. 25b).

The end of the sixty-nine "seven's" (the combination of the two first periods) marks a turbulent time. Again, the language is enigmatic. The Anointed One will be cut off, and the "people of the ruler" will destroy the "city and the sanctuary" (v. 26). The devastation will be complete and perhaps quick since it is compared to a flood. It will be a time of war and desolation.

(3) The last "seven," the seventieth, is itself divided in the middle and, far from clearing things up, continues the enigma. In the first place, the action of the seventieth week emanates from a single individual, who is simply referred to as "he." The closest antecedent is the "ruler" (nagid) of verse 26. The latter's relationship to the Anointed One is unclear and, as we will see, debated. Are they the same? After all, in verse 25 it is clear that the "Anointed One" is called the ruler (nagid), but the ruler in verse 26 is associated with destructive actions; and most Christian interpretations understand the Anointed One in a positive manner.

Nevertheless, it is clear that the actions of the seventieth week are the work of a destructive force. The unspecified "he" confirms a covenant for one "seven," presumably the seventieth, but in the middle of it he cuts off sacrifice and offering. While it may be possible to construe the latter in some way as positive, the erection of "an abomination that causes desolation" clearly is not. The period of the prophecy ends with the end of this disruptive person. In the next section, we will delve further, but with great caution, into the morass of interpretations of this enigmatic oracle.

Bridging Contexts

Daniel 9 Begins with Scripture reading, which leads to prayer that results in divine revelation. Daniel's reading of Jeremiah's letter moves him to acknowledge and ask forgiveness for the sins of God's people. The prayer, in turn, brings Gabriel to Daniel with a message from God.

The relationship between God's Word and prayer. Before turning our focus to the content of the prayer and revelation, let's pause for a moment on the dynamic of Daniel's communication with God. We get a rare Old Testament glimpse of Scripture reading in relationship to prayer. How do human beings communicate with God? Daniel 9 provides an illustration. God speaks to us through the words of his representatives, the prophets—in this case the writings of Jeremiah. Though dead and gone by this time, Jeremiah's written word still speaks God's word to his people. Daniel hears God's words in Jeremiah and responds through prayer. God then sends Gabriel with yet further revelation.

The principle is clear, though its contemporary application awaits the next section: God speaks to his people in his written and spoken Word. This principle is simple on the surface, but is really at the heart of biblical religion and contrasts with modern ideas of Christianity. Since the nineteenth-century philosophers Feuerbach and Nietzsche, it has commonly been believed that the God of Christianity is the product of human imagination. Human beings desire a God, so they have constructed him in their own image. The Bible, however, claims to be the revelation of God to human beings. God uses human language to make his existence and nature known to us. In the Bible, he makes his will known to his people. Daniel understands this as he meditates on Jeremiah's letter.

The six themes of Daniel 7–12, reviewed. While the form of Daniel 9— a prayer of repentance—is unique to its context, the surrounding chapters focus on apocalyptic visions of the future, whose content, especially when the divine revelation at the end is taken into account, shares themes with the preceding and following chapters. In the section "The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature" in the Original Meaning section of chapter 7, we identified the six themes that reverberate throughout the second half of the book of Daniel, together supporting the overarching thesis of the book of Daniel: In spite of present appearances, God is in control and will win the victory.

- (1) Human evil is horrible, particularly as it is concentrated in the state. This theme has certainly been in the forefront of the previous two chapters. 9 sees a shift of focus that has attracted the attention of previous interpreters. Throughout Daniel, the pagan nations, like Babylonia and Persia, have been seen as renegades from God. In Daniel's prayer, Israel too is named as rebel and transgressor. The suffering of God's people is ultimately the result of their own sin.
- (2) A specific time of deliverance is announced. Gabriel's response to Daniel's prayer is an extended announcement of the time of deliverance. As we discussed at length in the previous chapter, the numbers given in reference to the time of the fulfillment of prophecy or the end are wrongly understood as a kind of apocalyptic calendar. They rather give the sense of a definite end to suffering, a time known and determined by God himself and not revealed to human beings. The numbers are ultimately symbolic and impossible of conversion to an absolute date.

In our interpretation of the "seventy 'sevens" in the preceding section, we noted the futile search for an interpretation of these numbers to fit with our understanding of history. Attempts to correlate these years, understood as 490 years, with the date of Antiochus Epiphanes, Jesus Christ's first

- coming, his second coming, or any of the countless other special redemptive events that have caught interpreters' attention, have been unpersuasive to any but a few devoted followers. Such futile efforts work against the purpose of these texts, which is to point to God's determined timing of the end of sin and suffering without revealing the exact timing.
- (3) Repentance leads to deliverance. Evil is the result of resisting the way of God. Sin produces suffering. God is revealed as a holy God in this book, who judges those who sin. But he is also a gracious God, who forgives those who come to him and confess their sins. Acknowledgment of sin and confession—in a word, repentance—leads to deliverance or restoration. This theme has been earmarked for special discussion in this chapter; we will reserve further comment until we finish our survey of the six themes.
- (4) A cosmic war stands behind human conflict. This theme takes on major proportions in Daniel 10, but even here we get a glimpse of the supernatural universe that lies behind human history. Daniel prays to God, who in response sends an angel with his answer. In the next chapter we will see that these angels, even as they come with answers to prayer, are involved in a conflict with other supernatural powers (see comments on ch. 10).
- (5) Judgment is certain for those who resist God and oppress his people. Even though the evil of God's people is stressed in Daniel 9, the evil power that oppresses them does not escape condemnation and judgment. As we have commented above, the language of the "seventy 'sevens'" is difficult, and at times even the basic characters of the prophecy are unclear. However, no doubt attends the revelation that the period of time culminates in the destruction of the final embodiment of evil, who sets up "an abomination that causes desolation" (9:27). God wins out in the end.
- (6) Equally true is the fact that God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense. Daniel's prayer describes the covenant people as sinful and distant from God. Their sin has resulted in the judgment of the Exile. His prayer, however, is motivated by the hope of restoration that Jeremiah's prophecy instilled in his heart. He longs for that time of deliverance. It is with a message of life that Gabriel comes to Daniel. We have seen under the previous point that the message includes punishment for those who resist God to the end, but it also talks about the restoration of God's people. The "seventy 'sevens,'" after all, have as their purpose "to finish transgression, to put an end to sin, to atone for wickedness, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up vision and prophecy and to anoint the most holy."

Repentance and forgiveness. We have reserved chapter 9 for a fuller discussion of the third important theme of the last half of Daniel: repentance that leads to deliverance. Daniel prays a prayer of confession that apologizes for the past sins of his people, with the hope that God will hear his prayer and begin the process of forgiveness and reconciliation. In this section, we will explore more deeply the theological dynamics that fueled Daniel's hope.

At the heart of Daniel's prayer stands one of the most potent and pervasive theological themes of the Old Testament: the covenant. Its sudden appearance in Daniel 9 has led some commentators, as we have seen, to question whether Daniel's prayer is a foreign intrusion into the book. However, the covenant is such an important concept among the Old Testament people of God of whatever period that it is more surprising when it is absent. It is so pervasive an idea that it often lurks in the background, surfacing only at strategic moments. Daniel 9 is such a strategic moment.

The apocalyptic visions of the latter half of this book envision a deliverance for God's people from the oppression that began with Nebuchadnezzar's incursion into Judah (see 1:1–2). Israel's culpability for this turn of events is strongly implied in the language used there for the process of domination and exile that began at that moment "the Lord delivered Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand." Behind this simple statement stands the judgment of God, based on the curses of the covenant.

We will first explain the concept of covenant more carefully—an English word often used to translate the Hebrew word b^erit . This word is not a part of our everyday vocabulary, but it still has a vital life as a legal term. It is a legal expression for a relationship where commitments are made and sanctioned by law, which have the force of penalties for noncompliance. In many ways, covenant is a good translation equivalent for the biblical idea. More recent evidence from the ancient Near East, however, allows us to understand this legal term more precisely. The legal relationship is best recognized as a political treaty. In other words, in the covenant/treaty God is the Great King, who enters into a political treaty with his servant people Israel.

This understanding was reached by the awareness that certain key texts describing the covenant relationship between God and Israel bear a similar structure and reveal similar content to ancient Near Eastern treaties, particularly those found in the Hittite capital of Boghazkoi. This structure illuminates the theological principle at work in Daniel 9. As we describe the six parts of a covenant/treaty document, we will illustrate them from the book of Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy is not a treaty per se, but rather a sermon that describes the treaty relationship. Thus, it follows the outline only roughly, yet close enough to see that the concept is fairly applied to Deuteronomy. Using this biblical book as our paradigm covenant has the further advantage that the Mosaic covenant is the one that lies most directly behind Daniel's prayer.

The book of Deuteronomy follows the typical pattern of a treaty between the king of a powerful nation and the king of a relatively modest nation. This type of relationship is called a vassal treaty (as opposed to a treaty of equals, called a parity treaty) and has at least six standard elements:

- Introduction. An ancient Near Eastern vassal treaty began with the introduction of the two parties involved. In Deuteronomy 1 we do not have the actual treaty document, but we have an account of the ritual that affirms it. Clearly the two parties are God, who is the Great King, and the people of Israel, who are his servant people (Deut. 1:1–5).
- Historical review. An ancient treaty often began with a review of the history of the relationship between the two parties. In secular treaties, the great king would lay it on thick by telling the vassal king how wonderful he had been to the weaker nation and how ungrateful the other king had been to him. In Deuteronomy, of course, the historical remembrance is more than manipulative political ideology. It is the truth. God has been overwhelmingly gracious to Israel. From the Red Sea crossing to the moment forty years later when they stand poised to enter the Promised Land, God has taken care of his people (Deut. 1:9–3:27).

• Law-giving. After the gracious relationship between God and Israel has been firmly established, God gives them the law. This, too, follows the pattern of the ancient Near Eastern treaties, in which the present obligations of the law sprang from the relationship of the past. In Deuteronomy, though not in all biblical covenants, the law takes up the lion's share of the content (Deut. 4:1–26:19). Perhaps the reason for this is Moses' concern that Israel has been so disobedient in the desert.

The important theological point is that God delivers the law only after he has established his relationship with Israel. His law is not the cause of the relationship but the way in which the relationship will be continued and enriched. This is what we mean by saying the laws come in the context of grace. To make sure that Israel gets its priorities straight, the Ten Commandments begin with this reminder, "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery" (Deut. 5:6; cf. Ex. 20:2). God has graciously acted on their behalf, prior to anything they can do to earn his benevolence.

• Rewards and consequences. Next Deuteronomy stipulates consequences for disobedience. In ancient Near Eastern treaties, the great king would inform the wonderful rewards vassal that would obedience to his laws, while punishment would surely reach the one who disobeyed. In a similar manner, conditions are attached to Israel's response —either blessings or curses (Deut. 27:1–28:68). These blessings and curses make their presence felt throughout the canon of the Old Testament. Samuel and Kings in particular view the Exile as a result of breaking the laws of Deuteronomy, which has thus brought on the dreaded curses. Deuteronomy 28:64 is an ominous anticipation of that horrible period of

- Israel's history when God promises disobedient Israel that he will "scatter [them] among all nations."
- Witnesses. A treaty, being at heart a legal document, needs witnesses. In the ancient Near Eastern treaties, the gods and goddesses of the respective nations often served in this capacity. For Israel, the witness is God's creation, heaven and earth itself (Deut. 30:19–20).
- Review and succession. To complete the picture of the treaty or covenant in Old Testament times, we must mention the concern for the treaty text itself (e.g., where it should be placed) and for a regular reading of the document, as well as the provision for the succession of kings, especially in the vassal country. Treaties looked beyond the present to the future. Scribes made two copies of the treaty and usually placed them in the most important temples of the two nations entering the relationship.

This procedure wasn't necessary in the divine-human covenant, though it has been suggested that the two tablets of the law are actually two copies. In either case, the law is written and placed in the most sacred spot possible—the ark of the covenant. Every seven years, during the Feast of the Tabernacles, the priests are to read the law so the people can reaffirm their allegiance to it (Deut. 31:9–13).

In other words, the covenant provides the reason why the Israelites are suffering at the hands of the Babylonians. They have broken the law and are suffering the consequences of the curses, which includes removal from the Promised Land and exile to a foreign land. A prime example from the curse section of the book of Deuteronomy (28:64–68) is quoted above. But that is not the end of the story. Also quoted above is 1 Kings 8:46–51, which talks about the possibility of restoration. This hope also grows from the book of Deuteronomy, which envisions in 30:1–10 a time when the sins of the people have triggered the curses of the covenant. However, thanks to God's grace, the story does not end for God's people at that point:

When all these blessings and curses I have set before you come upon you and you take them to heart wherever the LORD your God disperses you among the nations, and when you and your children return to the LORD your God and obey him with all your heart and with all your soul according to everything I command you today, then the LORD your God will restore your fortunes and have compassion on you and gather you again from all the nations where he scattered you. Even if you have been banished to the most distant land under the heavens, from there the LORD your God will gather you and bring you back. He will bring you to the land that belonged to your fathers, and you will take possession of it. He will make you more prosperous and numerous than your fathers. The LORD your God will circumcise your hearts and the hearts of your descendants, so that you may love him with all your heart and with all your soul, and live. The LORD your God will put all these curses on your enemies who hate and persecute you. You will again obey the LORD and follow all his commands I am giving you today. Then the LORD your God will make you most prosperous in all the work of your hands and in the fruit of your womb, the young of your livestock and the crops of your land. The LORD will again delight in you and make you prosperous, just as he delighted in your fathers, if you obey the LORD your God and keep his commands and decrees that are written in this Book of the Law and turn to the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul.

Daniel's prayer is founded on the Deuteronomic covenant. He understands the present situation as the result of the breaking of the law and the consequent curses. But he also understands that the road to recovery is through repentance, which involves full acknowledgment of past transgression. There is no "forgive and forget" without confession here or anywhere in the Bible. Notice too that nowhere do we get the slightest evidence that Daniel has personally participated in the sins that led to the people's present condition. Yet he does not say, "Forgive them, Lord." Rather, he identifies with the people and cries out, "We have sinned and done wrong. We have been wicked and have rebelled; we have turned away from your commands and laws" (Dan. 9:5).

On the basis of a covenant relationship, Daniel turns to the Lord and confesses the sins of the people and includes himself among them. He acknowledges God's righteousness in the Exile, but also turns to the Lord with the hope of repentance. Repentance is the road to reconciliation.

Contemporary Significance

HEARING GOD'S VOICE today. Daniel turned to the writings of Jeremiah to hear the voice of God. Here he heard God speak to him and the nation, and it motivated his response of prayer and repentance. God then spoke to him further through the agency of Gabriel, an angel. Where do we go to hear God speak today? Where does God reveal himself to us? The opening verses of the book of Hebrews (1:1–4) points us in the right direction:

In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, and through whom he made the universe. The Son is the radiance of God's glory and the exact representation of his being, sustaining all things by his powerful word. After he had provided purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven. So he became as much superior to the angels as the name he has inherited is superior to theirs.

Jesus is God's fullest revelation of himself to us. He is God in human form. Where do we meet God in Jesus today? Most directly in the Bible. We should listen to Paul's well-known advice to Timothy (2 Tim. 3:14–16):

Continue in what you have learned and have become convinced of, because you know those from whom you learned it, and how from infancy you have known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work.

The difference between the time of Daniel and our own time is that we have a completed canon, Old and New Testament, which reveals God to us. We can see the pattern of God's progressive revelation as it tells the story of redemption that culminates in Jesus Christ. That is why we insist on ultimately reading the Old Testament through the light of the New Testament. It is one Word of God, which culminates in the New. The brighter light of the New Testament often helps us see the Old Testament more clearly.

However, as we have done in this commentary, it is essential first to consider the teaching of the Old Testament on its own grounds first. We must ask the question what the original audience understood before we can legitimately push forward to the New Testament. Otherwise, we risk the danger of reading into the Old Testament what is not there or missing important elements of its teaching.

The new covenant in Jesus. As we bridge the horizon to the fuller revelation of the New Testament in Daniel 9, we first of all notice that the foundational concept of the covenant reaches its culmination in the teaching of Jesus. Daniel looked back to the Mosaic covenant, while Jesus speaks of a new covenant.

At the end of his life, just before going to the cross, Jesus shared a last meal with his disciples, at which he introduced a ritual we know as the "Lord's Supper" or "communion." This ritual is described in the following words in Matthew 26:26–30:

While they were eating, Jesus took bread, gave thanks and broke it, and gave it to his disciples, saying,

"Take and eat; this is my body."

Then he took the cup, gave thanks and offered it to them, saying, "Drink from it, all of you. This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins. I tell you, I will not drink of this fruit of the vine from now on until that day when I drink it anew with you in my Father's kingdom."

When they had sung a hymn, they went out to the Mount of Olives.

Jesus thus seals a covenant with his twelve disciples. This should remind us of God's covenant dealings in the Old Testament. As a matter of fact, Luke adds the word "new" before "covenant" (Luke 22:20), making an explicit connection with Jeremiah 31:31–33. Jesus' language signifies continuity and discontinuity in the idea of the covenant as we move from the Old to the New Testament, and Jeremiah's prophecy is an important transitional statement.

Jeremiah, as we have already seen, not only told the people about their coming punishment based on their breaking of the covenant law, but he also gave them the hope that their punishment would lead to their repentance and to the rescue of the remnant. The most notable instance of this is in the so-called Book of Consolation. Jeremiah 31:31–34 is at the heart of God's message of hope:

"The time is coming," declares the LORD,
"when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah.
It will not be like the covenant
I made with their forefathers when I took them by the hand to lead them out of Egypt, because they broke my covenant, though I was a husband to them,"

declares the LORD.

"This is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel after that time," declares the LORD.

"I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts.

I will be their God and they will be my people.

No longer will a man teach his neighbor, or a man his brother, saying, "Know the LORD," because they will all know me, from the least of them to the greatest,"

declares the LORD.

Here we see a bridge between the Old Testament and the New, but one that suggests that there is both continuity and discontinuity. It is a covenant that has its foundations in the Old Testament covenants, but in some sense it is new.

What is new (i.e., what discontinuity is there) between the old covenant and the new? O. P. Robertson is correct to locate the necessity of discontinuity in the failure not of God or his covenant, but with the people. "The expulsion of the people of God from the land of promise at the time of the exile dramatizes their massive failure under the old covenant." According to Jeremiah, the new covenant is internal, immediate, and intimate in comparison to the old covenant. These differences are not a difference in kind as much as in degree. It is perhaps more precise to say that the new covenant is more internal, immediate, and intimate than the old.

The passage from Jeremiah 31 just quoted indicates that the new covenant "boasts a unique feature in its power to transform its participants from within their hearts." Further, there is no need for a teacher in the new covenant. Christians, as new covenant believers, know by experience that this promise does not imply that we know everything or that everything concerning God and his Word is clear to us. Nor does it mean that teachers and ministers should seek employment elsewhere. What it does mean is that no longer are human mediators of the covenant relationship needed. In the Old Testament, Moses, David, and many other leaders were the immediate recipients of the covenant relationship, and they in turn mediated it to the people. According to the New Testament, there is only one mediator and he is not merely human, he is Jesus Christ, Son of God (1 Tim. 2:5).

However, "new" in this case does not imply a complete break with the old. Robertson recognizes this and names the new covenant, the covenant of consummation. This highlights the fact that Jesus Christ does not abrogate or ignore the old covenants but rather fulfills them.

Space and time do not permit full justification of this point. Robertson does an excellent job showing how the new covenant relates to the old. He utilizes what we, his former students, used to call the "lazy V" diagram to indicate that the covenants are a function of progressive revelation, each building on the previous ones until they are consummated in Christ (see diagram on the following page).

The diagram visually represents the fact that Jesus fulfills the covenant with Abraham with its promises of descendants, land, and blessing for the nations (Gen. 12:1–3). Jesus Christ fulfills the covenant of law mediated by Moses, since he is the one who fulfills the conditions of the law. He also fulfills the covenant of the kingdom of David (2 Sam. 7), since he is David's greater Son who sits on the throne of the heavenly kingdom, which was merely reflected by David's political kingdom.

The Covenant Structure of Scripture¹⁶

But what is the role of the law in the new covenant? This is a complex and highly debated subject, which we neither can nor need to solve here except in general outline.¹⁷ Obeying the law has never been the route to establish a relationship with God. In the Old Testament, this is recognized by the fact that God rescued the Israelites from Egypt before giving them the law on Mount Sinai. The New Testament, particularly Paul, is clear that our salvation does not result from our obedience to the law (Gal. 3:10–11):

All who rely on observing the law are under a curse, for it is written: "Cursed is everyone who does not continue to do everything written in the Book of the Law." Clearly no one is justified before God by the law, because, "The righteous will live by faith."

However, the New Testament also indicates a continuing role for the law in such passages as James 1:22–25:

Do not merely listen to the word, and so deceive yourselves. Do what it says. Anyone who listens to the word but does not do what it says is like a man who looks at his face in a mirror and, after looking at himself, goes away and immediately forgets what he looks like. But the man who looks intently into the perfect law that gives freedom, and continues to do this, not forgetting what he has heard, but doing it—he will be blessed in what he does.

This language is reminiscent of the Old Testament teaching that those who keep the law will be blessed and those who do not will be cursed.

Again, this subject is complicated and the danger of a superficial understanding is great. For one thing, there is the question of how the Old Testament law functions in the New Testament. A full discussion would show that there is a continuity in principle, but not in the application found in the case law or in the penalties. Moreover, we need to remember that though there is strong teaching in Deuteronomy, the Prophets, Proverbs, and elsewhere that living a godly life leads to good results, there is also the teaching of Job, Ecclesiastes, and other books that keep us from reducing this to a facile formula. Good people do suffer in this life; bad people sometimes prosper. The New Testament indeed tells us that ultimate retribution does not take place in this life, but the next. However, to use one example, it is much more likely that you will have a good marriage if you do not commit adultery than if you do.

Jesus himself tells us that the law continues to play a crucial role in the new covenant (Matt. 5:17–20):

Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them. I tell you the truth, until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished. Anyone who breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven, but whoever practices and teaches these commands will be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I tell you that unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven.

The need for repentance. Yet as we all know, not only from the Bible but from our own experience, no one keeps the law perfectly. We have all broken the law. Breaking God's law leads to rupture in relationships—both in our relationship with God and often in human relationships. Through our sin, we strain our ties with those who are close with us: spouse, friends, coworkers, Christian brothers and sisters.

We can see how this works in Daniel 9. Daniel recognized that Israel's sin has ruptured its relationship with God. Historically, this break in relationship is represented by the Exile. Daniel prays to restore that relationship through a prayer of confession, apology, and repentance.

At the heart of the Christian religion stands repentance. It is not that our faith results from repentance, but repentance flows from faith in a God who forgives. Theologically, we may want to talk about how God initiates the movement toward repentance in our heart, but then we do not want to lose sight of the fact that our relationship with God, once broken, is restored through an act of repentance: "The time has come.... The kingdom of God is near. Repent and believe the good news" (Mark 1:15).

God requires acknowledgment of our sin in the context of restoring a relationship with us. And repentance does not stop after someone becomes a Christian. We must continue to acknowledge our inadequacies and rebellion in our relationship with God.

Before we go any further, we must square this point with a fundamental teaching of the New Testament. While we must repent of our sins, again our relationship with God is not based on our ability either to keep the law or even to keep up with our daily repentance. Why? Because our faith is not built on our good works or obedience, but rather on the work of Jesus Christ. He is the perfect lawkeeper. He is the only one who never broke the law, but he is also the one who died on the cross because of sin. In fulfillment of Old Testament sacrificial practice, Jesus is our substitute.

In the Old Testament period, an animal sacrifice accompanied the act of repentance. By sacrificing an animal, the Israelites acknowledged the depth of their sin. The animal died in their place. The New Testament teaches us that our repentance does not need an animal sacrifice because Jesus our high priest offered "one sacrifice for sins," and by this one sacrifice "he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy" (Heb. 10:12–14).

Jesus' death and resurrection is the foundation of our faith, not our repentance; but God calls us to repent of our sins to maintain a good relationship with him. As Paul states it, "godly sorrow [over some infraction] brings repentance that leads to salvation" (2 Cor. 7:10). Daniel displayed this sorrow in the light of the sin of God's people, which moved him to repentance and restoration with God. Paul describes the same principle to the Corinthians and through them to us.

Repentance not only restores the divine-human relationship, but it is also at the heart of reconciliation among God's human creatures. Let's pause again before expanding on this thought to make explicit why we treated the role of repentance in the divine-human relationship first. The Bible teaches time and again that human relationships can only be truly restored on the basis of a restored relationship with God. We see the two intertwined as early as the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2–3). Adam and Eve enjoyed a perfectly intimate relationship with one another in the Garden as long as they worshiped God. However, the story of the Fall is the story of mistrust and rebellion against God, which resulted not only in estrangement from God but also alienation from one another.

David demonstrates how distance from God produces a break in human relationships. In David's sin with Bathsheba, he violently tore human relationships as he slept with a married woman and then saw to it that her husband died in battle (2 Sam. 11). David tried to cover up his sin, but God sent Nathan the prophet to confront him with it. Psalm 51 is David's prayer of repentance (and indeed is one of a number of model prayers of repentance found in the Psalter). Here is how that psalm begins (Ps. 51:1–4):

according to your unfailing love; according to your great compassion blot out my transgressions.

Wash away all my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin.

For I know my transgressions, and my sin is always before me.

Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight....

Taken on its own, these verses are shocking. What could David mean that he sinned only against God? Tell that to Uriah in his grave. But in an important sense David is right. Our sins against other human beings are first and foremost sins against God, in whose image all human beings have been created.

Nonetheless, our acts and statements of repentance must go beyond a prayer, to the offended person. To restore a broken relationship often requires first a broken and humble heart. Jack Miller tells a powerful story of repentance in his book Come Back, Barbara. It is the story of a daughter who rebels against her upbringing by disowning God and rejecting her parents. Jack describes Barbara as turning her back on her spiritual heritage by pursuing a glamorous lifestyle of money, pleasure, and drugs. The story of the return of this prodigal daughter is a stirring one, one that climaxes with Barbara's acknowledgment of her rebellion and a return to God and family through faith and repentance.

Today, Barbara is a leader in New Life Church in Philadelphia, the church her now-deceased father founded a couple of decades ago. Jack Miller was my pastor for a number of years before his death, and his ministry had as one of its major themes the need for daily repentance in our relationship with God and with one another. His prescription for Christian living did not devolve to become a formulaic asking of forgiveness for every little offense against another. Indeed, overt repentance can at times be a bigger offense than the original offense. I remember a friend of mine becoming convinced that she had to ask the forgiveness of everyone she had ever sinned against in the past twenty years of her life. She dutifully called her parents, her friends, former boyfriends, and acquaintances. By doing this, she brought herself some measure of relief, but she succeeded in dredging up old emotions that had been resolved long before. Wisdom is needed to know how to proceed in the matter of past offenses.

But repentance goes even further than just between individuals. Walter Wink's recent contribution to his "Powers" series emphasizes that whole societies may find it necessary to repent in order to achieve some measure of reconciliation. As he strongly states it, "human societies could not exist without forgiveness and the public acts of contrition and confession that make reconciliation possible."²¹

Perhaps the most dramatic example that Wink provides is the process happening in South Africa at the time of this writing. South Africa witnessed for many decades the brutal oppression of the black majority at the hands of the white minority in the form of the insidious institution of apartheid. Now, however, South Africa has achieved a large measure of democracy, and the black majority finds itself in positions of power. One might expect (and justice might insist) in such a situation that the powers of vengeance would immediately engulf the society in a bloodbath, but that is not what has happened. On the contrary, grace is being displayed in such institutions as the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, established in 1995. This commission announced a period of time during which individuals who committed atrocities can come forward and make a full disclosure of their crimes with the promise of amnesty in most cases and in the court of law.

The principle is biblical. There is no reconciliation without confession. After the set period of time, the offenders who do not come forward will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law, but repentance brings restoration. True, the commission is not God. Its work is imperfect. For one thing, some who seek amnesty come forward and disclose without contrition. And certainly the commission cannot insist that the families of victims embrace those who even sincerely repent of their crimes of hate. But it is a promising sign, this measure of societal repentance, which, as Wink's narrative illustrates, has produced many moving individual stories.

Daniel 10:1-11:1

¹In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia, a revelation was given to Daniel (who was called Belteshazzar). Its message was true and it concerned a great war. The understanding of the message came to him in a vision.

²At that time I, Daniel, mourned for three weeks.

³I ate no choice food; no meat or wine touched my lips; and I used no lotions at all until the three weeks were over.

⁴On the twenty-fourth day of the first month, as I was standing on the bank of the great river, the Tigris, ⁵I looked up and there before me was a man dressed in linen, with a belt of the finest gold around his waist. ⁶His body was like chrysolite, his face like lightning, his eyes like flaming torches, his arms and legs like the gleam of burnished bronze, and his voice like the sound of a multitude.

⁷I, Daniel, was the only one who saw the vision; the men with me did not see it, but such terror overwhelmed them that they fled and hid themselves. ⁸So I was left alone, gazing at this great vision; I had no strength left, my face turned deathly pale and I was helpless. ⁹Then I heard him speaking, and as I listened to him, I fell into a deep sleep, my face to the ground.

¹⁰A hand touched me and set me trembling on my hands and knees. ¹¹He said, "Daniel, you who are highly esteemed, consider carefully the words I am about to speak to you, and stand up, for I have now been sent to you." And when he said this to me, I stood up trembling.

¹²Then he continued, "Do not be afraid, Daniel. Since the first day that you set your mind to gain understanding and to humble yourself before your God, your words were heard, and I have come in response to them. ¹³But the prince of the Persian kingdom resisted me twenty-one days. Then Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me, because I was detained there with the king of Persia. ¹⁴Now I have come to explain to you what will happen to your people in the future, for the vision concerns a time yet to come."

¹⁵While he was saying this to me, I bowed with my face toward the ground and was speechless. ¹⁶Then one who looked like a man touched my lips, and I opened my mouth and began to speak. I said to the one standing before me, "I am overcome with anguish because of the vision, my lord, and I am helpless. ¹⁷How can I, your servant, talk with you, my lord? My strength is gone and I can hardly breathe."

¹⁸Again the one who looked like a man touched me and gave me strength. ¹⁹"Do not be afraid, O man highly esteemed," he said. "Peace! Be strong now; be strong."

When he spoke to me, I was strengthened and said, "Speak, my lord, since you have given me strength."

²⁰So he said, "Do you know why I have come to you? Soon I will return to fight against the prince of Persia, and when I go, the prince of Greece will come; ²¹but first I will tell you what is written in the Book of Truth. (No one supports me against them except Michael, your prince. ^{11:1}And in the first year of Darius the Mede, I took my stand to support and protect him.)

IN DANIEL 10 we see the curtain pulled back a bit further so that we get an intriguing, yet mysterious glimpse of the heavenly realities that stand behind human conflict. This chapter is the first part of the final vision of the book of Daniel (which includes chs. 10–12). In general outline, this vision may be structured as follows:

- 1. Introduction to the Vision (10:1–11:1)
- 2. The Vision (11:2–12:3)
- 3. God's Instructions to Daniel (12:4–13)

This three-chapter unit is the third major vision concerning future realities in the second half of Daniel. It supplements the visions found in chapters 7–8. Chapter 9, we have seen, is a prayer, but even that chapter ends with the prophecy of the seventy weeks of years. Thus, we are again reminded that the focus of the second part of the book is on the future. But even though this is true, God's passion is to provide comfort to Daniel, and through him the faithful of his generation, in the midst of their suffering, alienation, and oppression.

To know that such a great salvation is coming in spite of the present circumstances cannot help but deeply encourage the godly. The passage continues to function with this intention to those who are living faithfully at a time far removed from that of Daniel. As we will observe, the prophecy continues to veil its revelation. It is more like a provocative glimpse at the future than anything a later reader can use to predict dates or specific events, but it is enough to serve its purpose: comfort and encouragement in spite of present suffering. Once again, therefore, for this entire section the purpose continues to be that of the whole book: In spite of present appearances, God is in control and will win the victory.

Daniel 10:1–11:1 serves as an introduction to the vision. It describes Daniel's distraught state of mind, leading to intense prayer. In response to that prayer God sends a messenger. Below we will discuss the ambiguity concerning the supernatural appearance described in this chapter. Is one being or two beings standing before Daniel? The answer to this question, however, does not affect our understanding of the whole. God, at some cost, sends a messenger through to Daniel with a striking revelation concerning the future (cf. 11:2–12:3).

Before we get too far ahead of ourselves, however, let us turn our attention to 10:1–11:1 and examine the introduction to the vision under two headings: (1) a heavenly vision (10:1–9), and (2) a conversation with a supernatural being (10:10–11:1).

A Heavenly Vision (10:1–9)

CHAPTER 10 BEGINS similarly to the previous three chapters, with a date that sets when the events of the chapter occur: in the third year of Cyrus. Cyrus was the Persian emperor who conquered Babylon in 539 B.C., leaving Darius the Mede in charge. This date is surely to be understood as three years after he became king of Babylon, thus inheriting authority over the Jewish population there. The date is probably 536/35 B.C. Already some of God's people have returned home under Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel (Ezra 1–2). Many, however, decide to stay in exile, including Daniel. We are not given any reasons, but perhaps his advanced age plays into the decision. We know that God has further use for him in Babylon.

In any case, this was the year that Daniel receives his final and climactic vision, described in Daniel 10–12. Interestingly, in a parenthetical comment, Daniel's Babylonian name, Belteshazzar, is cited.² He has not been referred to by this name since chapter 5, and here is the only occurrence in the second half of the book. The reasons for this particular use escape us, but certainly it reminds us of Daniel's life in the foreign court. Perhaps it is to remind us that even at the end of his life Daniel is still in exile.

The introduction to the appearance of the supernatural being(s) (v. 1b) describes the message's major topic and asserts that it is "true" and understandable. The topic is war—"a great war" that is coming in the future.

Daniel then describes for us, the readers, what he was doing at the time of the reception of the vision. For three weeks up to that moment, he has been in mourning. From the later words of the supernatural being we understand that this period of mourning was accompanied by prayer for understanding (v. 12). During this three-week period he had abstained from meat and wine. This reference indicates that Daniel's earlier abstention from choice food in favor of vegetables (ch. 1) was for a special short-term purpose and was not part of his long-term lifestyle. He denies himself in this case to gain a special hearing from the Lord.

Daniel also informs us that he did not use lotions during this time. The climate of the ancient Near East was hot and dry during much of the year and oils helped soothe the skin. But during a period of mourning such attention to personal comfort and even cleanliness was inappropriate and naturally neglected. Daniel was in a state of prayerful turmoil.

Then, on the twenty-fourth day of the first month,³ Daniel, standing on the banks of the Tigris River,⁴ receives a vision of a heavenly being that terrifies him. He has a human appearance, dressed like a priest in linen (Lev. 6:10) and wearing a belt of gold. His physical description looks more like a statue than an actual human being. His body is "like chrysolite, his face like lightning, his eyes like flaming torches, his arms and legs like the gleam of burnished bronze" (v. 6a). Furthermore, his voice booms "like the sound of a multitude" (v. 6b).

As many commentators have pointed out, the language that describes this heavenly being bears many similarities with descriptions of heavenly realities found in Ezekiel (esp. Ezek. 1). Christopher Rowland gives an excellent summary of the connections:

The first four words of Daniel 10:5 reveal very close contact with Ezekiel 9:2, though the overall impression given by the vision is of a closer connection with the first chapter of Ezekiel. The phrase "his loins" is found in Ezekiel 1:27 to describe the human figure, and the more explicit references to the different parts of the angel's body in Daniel 10:6 seems to be a development of the more reserved outlook of Ezekiel. In the same verse the eyes of the angel are said to be "like flaming torches." A similar phenomenon is said to be in the middle of the living creatures in Ezekiel 1:13. Whereas in Ezekiel 1:16 the wheels of the chariot are said to be "like the gleaming of a chrysolite," in Daniel the word tarshish (chrysolite) is now transferred to the description of the body of the angel. The body and feet can be paralleled in Ezekiel 1:23 and 1:7 respectively, and the voice of the angel (Dan. 10:6) bears some resemblance to the phrase "a sound of tumult like the sound of a host" in Ezekiel 1:24. The phrase "like the gleam of burnished bronze" is quoted verbatim from Ezekiel 1:7, where it is used of the legs of the living creatures.⁵

Those around Daniel do not see the vision, but somehow they sense some great power because they immediately flee the scene and hide. The situation is reminiscent of Paul's Damascus road experience (see Acts 9), where Paul's companions also saw nothing, though they heard a sound and stood speechless. Daniel, however, sees and hears, and in response, he staggers and collapses. Indeed, he apparently faints with his face buried in the ground.

Full discussion of the identity of the heavenly appearance awaits the next section. However, our first thought may be that this is a theophany. After all, the language, though sometimes indirectly connected to God, has already been associated with the great throne/chariot theophany of Ezekiel 1. Later, we will develop a connection between Daniel 10 and Revelation's description of Christ (cf. Rev. 1:15). Both the antecedent reference to Ezekiel and the later use of the imagery for Christ might lead us to the conclusion that the supernatural being standing before Daniel is divine. However, before we can conclusively assert that this is correct, we must proceed to the next section, where we hear a heavenly being speak.

A Conversation With a Supernatural Being (10:10–11:1)

VERSE 9, WHICH closed the previous section, reported that Daniel heard the figure dressed in linen speaking, but the content of his speech was not given there. Daniel's response to the vision and the voice was to faint dead away. The present section opens with the first of three supernatural ministrations (see also vv. 16, 18). Towner aptly calls these three angelic touches "celestial first aid." The first is the touch of a hand, which gives Daniel the strength to get up from the ground to all fours. He then addresses the prophet with words of encouragement, beginning with "you who are highly esteemed." The Hebrew for this English phrase is really two words, "is-ḥ^a*mudot*, the first noun being the common word for "man" and the second a noun derived from the verbal root ḥmd (best known as the main verb of the tenth commandment, "to covet"). Daniel is a highly desired, precious man, coveted by God.⁷ Indeed, this angelic visitation is for Daniel, so he should take encouragement.

With these words, Daniel receives courage enough to stand, though he is still trembling. The verb "trembling" in verse 11 is the hiphil participle of the verb r'd. Earlier (v. 7), the men with Daniel were said to be overwhelmed with terror. Literally, the phrase used there should be rendered "great trembling [the noun $h^a radah$] fell on them." Trembling (whether described by the verb r'd or the noun $h^a radah$) characterizes those who come into contact with the supernatural realm.

As the supernatural figure continues to speak with Daniel in verse 12, he again encourages the waning prophet. He begins with the straightforward command, "Do not be afraid." We see this comment at the beginning of a number of such speeches in the Bible (Gen. 15:1; 26:24; Judg. 6:23; Luke 1:13; Rev. 1:17). He then explains that, though the divine realm heard and began responding immediately to Daniel's prayers three weeks earlier, there was a delay because of a conflict, an obstacle in the form of the "prince of the Persian kingdom" (v. 13).

The supernatural speaker almost casually mentions the "prince of the Persian kingdom," but questions immediately rise in our minds. Who is this "prince" who can resist a heavenly being? What is the nature of the conflict of which we get this tantalizing glimpse? And, once again, what is the identity of the supernatural being who addresses Daniel and his connection with the vision of the figure dressed in linen (vv. 5–6)?

Perhaps we should start with the last question. In the previous section, we observed that the language and imagery associated with the being dressed in linen draws us to other theophanies. Our first impulse, supported by Daniel's reaction to the appearance, is to identify that figure with God himself. It is also most natural to associate this linen-clad figure with the one speaking to Daniel in the present section. Commentators like E. J. Young make this identification. However, other scholars rightly question such an association. After all, what power could resist God for twenty-one days, as the "prince of the Persian kingdom" apparently had done? Can we really imagine God being thwarted in his purposes so effectively, even if temporarily? With that in mind, Miller suggests that we are really dealing with two figures here: a theophany followed by an angelophany.¹⁰ Thus, God is not hindered, but rather his powerful, but not omnipotent angel.

Furthermore, in verse 13 we will learn that the supernatural being speaking to Daniel was unable to overcome the obstacle provided by the "prince of the Persian kingdom" until Michael comes to his aid. Are we to think that God is unable to overcome this hindrance without the help of one of his created angels? Doubtful to say the least, Miller goes on to identify the angel as specifically Gabriel, on the speculative assumption that Gabriel is the messenger angel, a kind of Hebrew Hermes; but we know so little of the details of the angelic world that such a naming is no more than an educated guess, an unnecessary one at that.

I am attracted to Miller's suggestion that the two figures are different, the first being God and the second an angel, but I am also hesitant to be dogmatic about my affirmation of it. After all, there is no clear textual signal that tells us that a second figure has come into play with verse 10. It effectively solves a problem, but as such, we should hold it only as a possible hypothesis. In any case, we have a clear case of spiritual conflict. On the one side stands God's powerful angelic army and on the other "the prince of the Persian kingdom."

Who is this "prince of the Persian kingdom"? Calvin said that this was a reference to the human prince Cambyses." But how likely is it that Daniel sees God's angels detained by a skirmish with Cambyses? No, these verses give us a hint at the cosmic battle that parallels the earthly struggles of God's people. The "prince of the Persian kingdom" is a supernatural being who fights on behalf of that human kingdom. The Old Testament knows of such spiritual entities and events in other books besides Daniel, perhaps most notably in Deuteronomy 32:8–9

When the Most High gave the nations their inheritance, when he divided all mankind, he set up boundaries for the peoples according to the number of the sons of God.¹² For the LORD's portion is his people, Jacob his allotted inheritance.

The Bible here, we would argue, refers to God's angelic creatures who make up his heavenly council as "the sons of God." There are angels, in other words, "assigned" to different nation states. Such might also be implied in the warning found in Deuteronomy 4:19: "And when you look up to the sky and see the sun, the moon and the stars—all the heavenly array—do not be enticed into bowing down to them and worshiping things the LORD your God has apportioned to all the nations under heaven." The same connection between rebellious human power represented in the state and evil cosmic powers may be seen in Isaiah 24:21–23:

In that day the LORD will punish the powers in the heavens above and the kings on the earth below.

They will be herded together like prisoners bound in a dungeon; they will be shut up in prison and be punished after many days.

The moon will be abashed, the sun ashamed;
for the LORD Almighty will reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before its elders, gloriously.

We must be careful not to speculate on the hints the Bible gives us, but that there are spiritual powers, good and bad, behind the various human institutions is a truth taught in the Old Testament and, as we will see in the Bridging Contexts and Contemporary Significance sections, in the New Testament as well.

In summary, the picture that emerges from Daniel 10:12–14 is that of a heavenly conflict. On the one side stands those spiritual forces that emanate from the Lord. The speaker, who is an unnamed angelic power (if not God himself) and Michael fight on God's side. Michael, whose Hebrew name means "Who is like God?" is mentioned four places in the Bible besides here (Dan. 10:21; 12:1; Jude 9; Rev. 12:7). Throughout the Bible, he plays an important leadership role in God's heavenly army. He is called "chief prince" and "archangel." In a word, he is a powerful spiritual being. On the other side stands "the prince of the Persian kingdom," who himself is powerful, but we are to understand that he is evil as well. He has tried to keep the heavenly messenger away from Daniel but has not succeeded, though (as we will see below) the fight is far from over.¹³

After describing the conflict that led to the delayed answer to Daniel's prayer, the heavenly messenger announces the substance of his message, which will be delivered beginning with Dan. 11:2: "Now I have come to explain to you what will happen to your people in the future, for the vision concerns a time yet to come" (10:14). Some believe that the language here suggests that the vision will at some point address the time just before the end of history as we know it.¹⁴

Again, Daniel is overwhelmed by the vision and bows to the ground, unable to speak. Again, a supernatural being ministers to him by touching his lips so he can speak. Though this being is referred to with a phrase similar to that found in 7:13 ("one like a son of man"), we should not be too quick to identify the two, since the phrase could be used of any humanlike appearance of God or angels. The touch of the lips reminds us of the call of Isaiah (Isa. 6:7), though here the emphasis is on the granting of strength in the midst of weakness, not on cleansing. This touch only gives Daniel the strength, it appears, to express his weakness. Thus, another touch follows in verse 18, accompanied by exhortations not to be afraid and to be strong (v. 19). Thanks to the supernatural ministrations, the prophet announces that he is ready to receive the vision.

The present chapter division obscures the flow of the section. We have already pointed out that Daniel 10–12 are a unit. Granted that chapter divisions are necessary for such a long unit, the first one should have come either after 10:19 or after 11:1, not in its present place. In 10:20 the speech of the "one like a son of man" commences. In 10:20–11:1, the figure, probably an angel, gives a general overview of what is to come before outlining the details (the bulk of ch. 11). He is going to tell Daniel "what is written in the Book of Truth." Collins is surely right that, from what follows, we are to understand that book as containing the course of future history as shaped by God. He is also correct to note that the concept of such a book, followed by a detailed reading of centuries that follow Daniel, has a strong deterministic flavor.

How one reacts to that idea depends to some extent on one's attitude toward God, but within the world of the text, which we are invited to share, this is nothing short of gloriously good news. Remember that the people contemporary with this book and throughout most periods of history are the oppressed people of God, who see no human escape from their oppression. The fact that God has scripted history and that the rescue of his people is the punch line is cause for great optimism and celebration (see the Contemporary Significance sections of chs. 11–12).

The angel tells us that he will soon return to the fray. The conflict with the prince of Persia, whom we have argued is the spiritual evil that supports the human kingdom oppressing God's people, goes on. After a while, it is implied, another spiritual power, the prince of Greece, will come. To use the language of chapters 7–8, another beast will come along. The fight will continue. But before the prophecy of the future goes on, the angel, perhaps here identifying himself as Gabriel (by allusion to Dan. 9:1), says that he has been fighting, with Michael, the prince of Persia since the very beginning (i.e., the first year of Darius the Mede). This reminds us, who tend to think of the Persians (who allowed God's people to return to Judah) as much better than the Babylonians, that these new oppressors are also evil and need to be overcome. God and his angels announce that they will fight on behalf of their people.

Bridging Contexts

In "THE NATURE of Apocalyptic Literature" in the Original Meaning section of chapter 7, we identified six major themes that run throughout Daniel 7–12. By way of review, these are:

- the horror of human evil, particularly as it is concentrated in the state
- the announcement of a specific time of deliverance
- repentance that leads to deliverance
- the revelation that a cosmic war stands behind human conflict
- judgment as certain for those who resist God and oppress his people
- the equally certain truth that God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense.

We have already established the fact that Daniel 10–12 stands as a single unit. Thus, we need not expect all six themes to be present in chapter 10. According to our announced schedule, here we will discuss the fourth theme concerning the cosmic war, which, of course, is the heart of our chapter. Before we do, however, I should mention that the first theme is clearly present in the chapter as well. Heavenly powers fight evil spiritual powers that are associated with the state, specifically Persia and Greece. In other words, Persia and Greece are revealed as more than just human evil, as horrible as that is, for the veil is pushed back a bit to see the spiritual horrors that stand behind their power.

Holy war in the Old Testament. To more fully understand the cosmic war that lies behind this human conflict, we must situate the content of this chapter in the broader story of holy war in the Old Testament. This will also provide the basis on which we grasp the connections with the spiritual warfare of the New Testament. Only a brief description of this incredibly pervasive and significant biblical theme can be given here, but we can at least sketch out a basic skeleton outline that will help us build a bridge from the ancient world of the Old Testament to the New Testament and ultimately our own situation.

Holy war is a term never found in the Old Testament itself. However, the term is useful because it describes the character of warfare found there. At the center of holy war is Yahweh, the divine warrior. God fights on his people's behalf to give them the victory. Another way of stating the same truth is to say that God uses his people as a tool of his judgment against the evil of the world. We can see this impulse at work at the Red Sea (Ex. 15), the battle of Jericho (Josh. 6), the defeat of the Midianites at the hands of Deborah and Barak (Judg. 5), and the anticipation of the defeat of Nineveh (Nahum), to name just a few. It is not that Israel does not fight, but they know that their victory is not a result of their own power and strategy, but because of God's fighting on their behalf.

The presence of Yahweh as the divine warrior explains many of the distinctive features of Old Testament holy war. Before a battle, Israel had to be sure that the conflict was God's will (Josh. 5:13–15; 1 Sam. 23:1–6). They were not given carte blanche for warfare. This explains why the ark of the covenant was often taken along into the battle. The ark was the mobile symbol of God's presence on earth. It explains too why the act of warfare took on the aura of worship, requiring the troops to be a cultically clean state. A soldier had to be as spiritually prepared to enter battle as he would to enter the holy precincts of the sanctuary. Warfare was an act of worship in the Old Testament.

After the battle, Israel's response was to praise the Lord (Ex. 15). After all, they knew that God had won the victory. In those cases where Israel actually had the upper hand in terms of numbers or weapons technology, God insisted that they divest themselves of these advantages before they entered the battle for fear that afterwards they would praise themselves, not God. Many psalms found their original purpose in the celebration of holy war victory (Ps. 24; 98).¹⁷

But there was a flip side to this idea of holy war. Israel was not always the tool of God's judgment; at times it was the object. W. Moran coined the term unholy war to describe those times when God turned his warring activity against Israel.¹⁸ This term is not felicitous, however, since any war with which God is involved is by definition holy. Moran also used the phrase reverse holy war; this is better, since Israel found itself, because of its disobedience, in a reversed situation, feeling the brunt of Yahweh's anger. While anticipations can be noted (e.g., 1 Sam. 4–5), the most striking example of reverse holy war is the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and is recorded by the author of Lamentations, who cries out (Lam. 2:4–5):

Like an enemy he [God] has strung his bow; his right hand is ready.

Like a foe he has slain all who were pleasing to the eye; he has poured out his wrath like fire on the tent of the Daughter of Zion.

The Lord is like an enemy; he has swallowed up Israel.

He has swallowed up all her palaces and destroyed her strongholds.

He has multiplied mourning and lamentation for the Daughter of Judah.

These are just a few examples, both positive and negative from Israel's point of view, where God pictures himself as a warrior in the Old Testament. Prior to Daniel 10, though, we should point out, Israel's most recent experience was the latter—God as an enemy. Israel had been carried off into captivity, not as a historical accident, but rather at the command of Yahweh as the divine warrior.

Holy war in Daniel. The book of Daniel is written with this as a background. Yahweh in the distant past fought on Israel's side when they were obedient. However, he also fought against them when they strayed. Where do they go from here? It is Daniel's repentance on behalf of the people that triggers the divine response: "I am fighting on your behalf and will indeed be victorious! Your freedom from oppression will indeed be won once and for all." We have seen this in Daniel 7, with the vision of the victory of the one like the son of man over the power represented by the beasts. We have seen this subtly asserted in the interpretation of the vision of Daniel 8, when it is said of the "master of intrigue" that "he will be destroyed, but not by human power" (8:25), as well as at the end of the prophecy of the "seventy 'sevens'" (9:20–27), which states concerning the one who sets up an abomination of desolation that the end has been decreed for him (9:27).

In chapters 11–12, Daniel will describe this victory more clearly. But chapter 10 serves an important purpose by exposing the spiritual realities behind the wars of Yahweh up to this point. In the description of the historical battles throughout most of the Old Testament, the concentration is on the earthly. Certainly the heavenly forces that have supported Israel have been revealed, but not the spiritual powers on the other side.

But we should not be surprised. At its origin the spiritual nature of the conflict is clear. Genesis 3 introduces conflict into the world. Behind the rebellious decision for which Adam and Eve were responsible stands the instigation of the serpent. The serpent, as later Scripture (Rev. 12:9) makes clear, was not an ordinary animal, but rather an incarnation of the evil one, Satan himself. The conflict that emanates from Genesis 3 to the consummation anticipated in the book of Revelation is understood in spiritual terms according to the curse God places on the serpent (Gen. 3:14–15):

Cursed are you above all the livestock and all the wild animals!
You will crawl on your belly and you will eat dust all the days of your life.
And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel.

The redemptive history that follows describes a conflict that flows from this curse between those who follow God and those who side with the serpent.¹⁹

Contemporary Significance

In Daniel 10 the veil is pulled back slightly, and we see the divine realities behind human conflict. As we situated the chapter in the context of the Old Testament as a whole in the previous section, we noted how deeply involved God has been in warfare. Here we are at the heart of one of the deepest difficulties that contemporary readers have with the Old Testament: How can God be so centrally involved in something so gruesome as warfare?

In addition, there is the sad fact that through the history of the church these texts have been used to justify warfare. How many lives have been lost in the name of a "holy cause"? From Constantine through the Crusades to modern American wars, the holy wars of Joshua and others have been used as justifications for violence against "godless heathens" or those with dangerous theologies. Perhaps most despicably we see certain fringe individuals and groups that claim the name of Christ to utilize violence in the name of defending "Christian" values in the midst of the culture wars. We need only cite the murder of an abortion doctor in Pensacola by an evangelical or the tactics of the Christian Identity Movement.

For most contemporary Bible readers, the holy wars of the Old Testament are an embarrassment. How can they have any contemporary relevance at all?

Holy war and the New Testament. Daniel's picture of the warrior God in Daniel 7–12 pointed to the future. God was fighting on behalf of his people to be sure, but there was also a strong message that the decisive battle was yet to come; that is the note on which the Old Testament concluded and which reverberated through the prophetic silence of the intertestamental period. When that silence was broken with John the Baptist, he was simply continuing the hope expressed in Daniel for the coming intervention of the divine warrior who would bring evil to a violent justice (Matt. 3:11–12):

I baptize you with water for repentance. But after me will come one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire. His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

Jesus came to the Jordan, and John recognized him as the one about whom he had been talking. He baptized Jesus and soon thereafter was imprisoned by Herod. While in prison John began to hear reports about the ministry of Jesus, and these reports distressed him greatly. He did not hear of burning and threshing, but rather of healing, exorcisms, and preaching the good news. Where was the divine warrior? John responded to these reports by sending his disciples to interrogate Jesus: "Are you the one who was to come, or should we expect someone else?" (Matt. 11:3). Jesus took these visitors out with him while he did more of the same—healing, exorcising, and preaching. In doing so he was telling them that indeed he was the one John was anticipating. He is the divine warrior. However, he has come to intensify and heighten the battle. No longer will the battle be waged against the flesh and blood enemies of God's people, but rather he will fight Satan himself.

Daniel 10 indicates in a way rarely addressed in the Old Testament that there was already a cosmic-spiritual dimension to the warfare of old. Now we see that Satan has become the clear object of divine battle. The irony of the gospel is that that battle is won, not through killing, but rather by dying. Jesus, the warrior, accomplished his great victory by dying on the cross.

Jesus put away human weapons of violence and commanded his followers to do the same when he rebuked Peter for using a sword to attempt to prevent his arrest on the eve of his crucifixion: "Put your sword back in its place ... for all who draw the sword will die by the sword. Do you think I cannot call on my Father, and he will at once put at my disposal more than twelve legions of angels? But how then would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen in this way?" (Matt. 26:52–54).

Paul too understood the warlike character of the cross and reflected on Christ's death by using military language. On the cross, Jesus "disarmed the powers and authorities" and "made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them" (Col. 2:15). In Ephesians 4:7–8, he spoke of the ascension by quoting an Old Testament divine warrior hymn (Ps. 68) to the effect that Jesus was leading a victory parade to heaven.

Jesus has completed and won the great conflict about which we read throughout the Old Testament, the battle begun in Genesis 3:15 and provocatively described in Daniel 10. But the victory is an already/not yet event. That is, the victory has been secured on the cross, but it still awaits its final denouement. Some scholars have likened the victory of the cross to the defeat of Germany at the battle of Normandy. After D-Day, the back of German power was broken in Europe and there was no doubt about the conclusion of the war. Nonetheless, battles still had to be fought and lives lost before the war would end.

We live spiritually between D-Day and V-Day. The victory has been won, but the fight is still real. The New Testament continues its use of military language to communicate both important truths: (1) We are in the midst of a tremendous battle with the forces of evil, and (2) the final victory is in sight.

The Christian's holy war manifesto. Let us explore the first of these truths by citing what I call the Christian's holy war manifesto, Ephesians 6:10–18:

Finally, be strong in the Lord and in his mighty power. Put on the full armor of God so that you can take your stand against the devil's schemes. For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms. Therefore put on the full armor of God, so that when the day of evil comes, you may be able to stand your ground, and after you have done everything, to stand. Stand firm then, with the belt of truth buckled around your waist, with the breastplate of righteousness in place, and with your feet fitted with the readiness that comes from the gospel of peace. In addition to all this, take up the shield of faith, with which you can extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one. Take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. And pray in the Spirit on all occasions with all kinds of prayers and requests. With this in mind, be alert and always keep on praying for all the saints.

Many Christians neglect reading this passage on the basis of the Old Testament theme of the divine warrior, and our neglect can cause us to lose hope during the fury of the battle. When my boys were small, sometimes we would wrestle. They loved beating on their father until the tide turned and the old man suddenly experienced a surge of energy and overthrew all three attackers. The swing from victory to defeat brought a cry of consternation: "Dad, let us up! Let's quit! Let's play something else!"

The same is true when we stand dressed in our well-starched armor, Bible under our arm, ready to pounce on a problem. When the mud and blood begin to mingle together in an unearthly hue, it is important to know that God is still the divine warrior, who has already secured victory, no matter how tragically defeating this particular battle may appear.

We are to fight, just as Israel was to fight. But also like Israel, we need to recognize that we will have victory only as we allow God to use us. We are not to be passive; we are to "stand firm." But our strength to do this comes only as we put on the "armor of God."

Who is the enemy Paul is referring to in Ephesians 6? Our ultimate enemy is Satan and his demonic powers. Our struggle against him encompasses three fronts, and we should not underestimate our enemy's strength. To do so will lead to the temptation to fight our battles in our own strength, and our own strength will lead to our quick and easy defeat. When we realize that we have no power to ourselves to fight the battles of life, we are driven to Jesus, our divine warrior. He is the One who provides us with the spiritual weapons we need to fight—truth, righteousness, the gospel of peace, faith, salvation, the Spirit, and prayer.

(1) The first front is the battle against evil "out there." Most Christians do not need to be convinced that there is a lot of sin and evil in the world. Wickedness emanates from institutions and people (unfortunately from Christians as well as non-Christians), from ourselves (as we will discover in the third front), as well as from others. The following is just the tip of the iceberg.

Many Christians from Roman times to today have suffered at the hands of a wicked government. Christian martyrs through the ages testify to the potential wickedness of political institutions. One of many contemporary situations is the plight of a Ugandan Christian named Kefa Sempangi. I went to seminary with Kefa and heard his account firsthand. He has since published a book, A Distant Grief,²⁰ in which he remembers his near death at the hands of one of then-president Idi Amin's death squads and his subsequent flight to the Netherlands and the United States. But even after his return to Uganda in the post-Amin era, his life as a minister and a politician has been beset by further persecutions.

The medical industry, the heart of so much mercy and healing, is also one of the perpetuators of the abortion industry, and, as such, is an institution, like all other human institutions, tainted by the hand of the Evil One. One woman confided in me that as a teenager she turned to her doctor for help when she discovered she was pregnant. The doctor advised her that she needed an abortion and calmed her fears with the assurance that there was nothing wrong with the procedure. She has struggled with guilt-induced insomnia ever since.

My wife and I will never forget the call we got from the Yale University student clinic where we went to find out whether she was pregnant with our second child. The nurse told her, "You're pregnant," but before we had time to rejoice, the nurse asked my wife if she wanted an abortion. In this world torn by conflict, the human institution most dedicated to preserving human life finds itself destroying it.

Many, indeed all, other human institutions are similarly affected by the conflict between the divine and the demonic. I have been active in sports through the years. I have derived enjoyment and a healthier body because of it. But I can also testify on some levels there is a sports ethos that allows, and even encourages, the use of pain-deadening and muscle-enhancing drugs, which are ultimately life-threatening. My wife and I both sport bad knees, the direct result of coaches insisting that we start playing too soon after a minor injury. They were more interested in winning than in health.

Even the church as an institution has been the source of much pain and evil. It doesn't take the obvious cases like the Spanish Inquisition to illustrate this point. We have all experienced the hardness of a dysfunctional church family at some point in our Christian life. One of the saddest moments of my life was when I was up for ordination. The denomination I belonged to had a liberal tendency, but I did not know much better since I was still a young Christian at the time. It was the denomination in which I grew up, and I felt attached to it. However, I was wise enough to go to an evangelical seminary because I knew I had to be taught by people who respected the Bible as God's Word, something not true of this denomination's seminaries.

About a year into my work, the ordination council called me to a meeting and told me that they would not ordain me because I attended an evangelical seminary and because I held certain biblical doctrines. What hurt me more than anything was the conversation I had with another person my age while I was waiting for the committee to meet with me. This man ridiculed me for my trust in the Bible and then proceeded to deny every doctrine I considered important to Christianity—the historicity of Jesus, the role of the Holy Spirit, the trustworthiness of Scripture, and the Second Coming. He, too, was meeting with the church council that day, but for a reason different from my own. He was being ordained on Sunday, and they were setting up the service for him! I felt like someone kicked me in the face.

These are just a few of the examples of societal forces and institutions that are the source of evil against which we should battle. But we all know that institutions are not abstract entities that exist independent of human involvement. Institutions are made up of people. We are talking about a spiritual battle with real people on either side.

(2) Another front is the fight to "win souls." Opinions may differ, but I cringe every time I hear someone say, "I won a soul for Christ." Perhaps it's the arrogant voice that usually goes along with the claim. But I must admit that there is some truth to this old Christian expression. When we share the gospel with others, we are involved in warfare, just as real as, and indeed with longer lasting implications than, the battle of the Israelites against Jericho.

A careful study of the entire Bible indicates that evangelism replaces warfare as we move from the Old to the New Testament. That is, in the Old Testament, the predominant way of relating to the outsider (the non-Israelite) was to fight with real weapons. In the New Testament, the way we are to relate to the non-Christian is defined by Jesus in the Great Commission: "Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you" (Matt. 28:19–20).

Does not experience teach us that evangelism is often like a war? Some of our experiences are more explicitly warlike than others. There are plenty of Christians who can tell horrifying stories of real abuse as a result of evangelism. The main reason for this is that when we share the gospel with a stranger or friend, we are not just involved in a quiet clash of ideas with another rational human being. We are sharing the news of sin and redemption with someone who is on Satan's side, whether that person is conscious of it or not.

If a person is not devoted to Christ, there is only one other alternative—he or she is devoted to Christ's enemy. That is why Paul talks about baptism as a symbol of death. It is warfare. If a person becomes a Christian, one dies to the old self and puts on the new by "having been buried with him [Christ] in baptism and raised with him through your faith in the power of God, who raised him from the dead" (Col. 2:12).

(3) The battle on the third front is that between the "new self" and the "old self." Jesus instructed us to take the beam out of our own eye before we take the speck out of our brother's eye (Matt. 7:5). In this way, he was telling us that the battle is not only against others, it is also within ourselves. Facing the deeply embedded evil of our own hearts is where the most bitter fighting occurs. It's like a civil war. Your enemy, your old self, is a dearly loved friend you really don't want to kill. The apostle Paul perceptively shared the struggle that went on in his own heart, knowing that it is a struggle we all go through (Rom. 7:21–24a):

So I find this law at work: When I want to do good, evil is right there with me. For in my inner being I delight in God's law; but I see another law at work in the members of my body, waging war against the law of my mind and making me a prisoner of the law of sin at work within my members. What a wretched man I am!

Once we become Christians, we are no longer in Satan's army; we are in Christ's. We fight for the gospel, taking on Satan, our former commander-in-chief. However, there is a part of us that still acts as if we are part of this world rather than pilgrims looking forward to the realities of heaven. The Bible names this tendency the "old self" (Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9) and tells us to cast it off and put on the "new self." Theologians call this the process of "sanctification," but that is just another way of saying that Christians should become more like Christ every day.

Whatever you call it, our Christian growth is a battle against Satan in our own hearts. This front, for most of us, is the hardest. It's not easy to fight evil in another person. It may be tough for some of us to share the gospel with others. But it is grueling to face the dark, cold reality that we have to battle against our own vicious and destructive thoughts, emotions, and actions.

This is because deep down we really enjoy our sin and find any way we can to justify it in our eyes. I am not often emotionally down, but when I am depressed I need to have a scapegoat—God has given me too much work, my wife is ignoring me, my children are brats, my Little League team is uncommitted. I would much rather be happy than depressed, but at times like this, I would rather be depressed than to think that I have overcommitted myself to writing projects, been cold toward my wife, not disciplined my children sufficiently, and not taught my Little Leaguers how to hit or field.

As we engage in battle on this final front, we must remember that it is ultimately God against whom we struggle. It is not merely the new us that takes on the old us in our own power. The battle of the cosmos—the struggle between God and Satan—is waged in our very hearts, and the message of the Bible is absolutely clear: Nothing can stand before God in defiance and survive. This is the reason why the battle always goes to the advantage of the new self; it is God who fights for us. The Bible confirms that life is a battle. This is why God has revealed so much throughout its pages about his nature as a warrior and our participation in his army.

Our weapons. However, it is important to remember, especially as we focus in this commentary on an Old Testament book, that as we move from the Old Testament to the New Testament period, the warfare has shifted from a physical to a spiritual battle. It is one we must fight with spiritual weapons, not physical ones. That is, the teachings of Jesus do not allow us to hit an abortionist or bomb a clinic. We are not permitted to kidnap a potential convert and force him or her to listen to the gospel. And we should not whip ourselves (physically as some monks did in the Middle Ages) to discourage our sinning. Our weapons are prayer, faith, and bold love.

(1) Most of us think of prayer as a retreat from the action, not as an offensive weapon with which we attack the enemy. After all, when we want to pray, we usually seek out a quiet spot. We also hear and use the expression "let me pray about it" when we are not sure we want to do something we are asked to do.

In reaction against this, we must cultivate a mindset that sees prayer as a powerful tool by which to foil Satan's schemes and destroy his handiwork. We are to see prayer as our principal means of communication with our divine war Commander.

In the war between Iraq and the allied forces who came to the aid of Kuwait, one of the largest of many discrepancies between the two sides was in the area of communication. The allies were in constant touch with each other and knew the enemy positions through the use of highly sophisticated technology. On their part, the front lines of the Iraqi armies knew little about their enemy's positions and could not even communicate with their commanders in Baghdad. The result was a lopsided victory for the Allies.

We need to use prayer to ask our spiritual Commander to open our eyes to the conflict so we may see where the Enemy is located, and then to provide us with the strength to carry on the battle.

The curses of the psalms are a model of using prayer as a weapon. The psalmist in Psalm 69:24–25, 27 made some strong statements as he spoke to God about his enemies:

Pour out your wrath on them;
let your fierce anger overtake them.
May their place be deserted;
let there be no one to dwell in their tents....
Charge them with crime upon crime;
do not let them share in your salvation.

While these psalms are models to us for prayer, they must be wisely used in the knowledge that the object of our warfare has shifted from flesh and blood enemies to spiritual ones. Our weapons must be spiritual, too. One concrete way the Christian can use prayer as a weapon against an abuser is to pray for his or her repentance.

(2) A second weapon of spiritual warfare is faith, a deep trust in the One who is our commander-in-Chief, Jesus Christ. Faith is multifaceted. One of the ways to think of faith is as a willingness to let go, to relax in the presence of someone who is good. A small child squeals with anticipation as her father lifts her above his head and gently tosses her into the air, catching her as she tumbles toward the ground. Such a child could scream and cry at being lifted and turn her little body into a stone-like, inflexible dead weight. Such a response would indicate a lack of trust. Faith may not take away all our fear or doubt, but it will enable us to know, at some deep level, that our Father is good and his purpose consistent with his character.

Faith, then, is an assertion of trust, even when our circumstances point in a direction that seems to call into question God's goodness. Faith is vision of what cannot be seen, a knowing of something that is beyond verifiable human knowledge. It is an assent to the inner witness of the Spirit that continues to keep a flame alive in us after all our efforts to snuff it out have failed. Fundamentally, we know that he is capable and willing to bring the battle to a successful completion. Indeed, the Scriptures tell us that he has already accomplished the victory on the cross, and we have a preview of the final day in the book of Revelation.

One of the many lessons of the Vietnam War was the disastrous consequences of a lack of trust between soldiers and their commanding officers. Soldiers often did not trust the abilities of their officers, and there were even alarming reports of soldiers putting a bullet in the back of their officers during battles. A firm trust in God is incredibly important if we are to endure the day-to-day battles of life. We need to know that God is there in his power to encourage us to face the angry boss at work, our unrepentant spouse, or our disobedient children.

These are just two of the spiritual weapons which Ephesians 6 mentions. In closing I want to emphasize that the spiritual nature of our weapons does not mean that they are intangible. We are not to be passive. We are not called to love people, even those who hurt us, from a distance, but we are required to move into their lives to open the door to their repentance.

Territorial demons? Before shutting the door on our discussion of spiritual warfare, we must address the issue of engagement with supernatural enemies, specifically territorial demons. Is this a fourth front of our warfare? There is a growing call in some sectors of the church worldwide and in America today to engage in battle with demons that control specific geographical regions.²¹ The foundational text for such a strategy is Daniel 10, so it is vital for us at least to speak to the issue, if only briefly.

I must confess, as I discuss this volatile issue, that my experience in this area has not been extensive or encouraging. Biblically, I affirm the existence of the world of supernatural evil forces, and Daniel 10 in particular witnesses to the association in some sense of demonic powers with specific geographical regions. However, as I have emphasized above, this chapter gives us just the merest of glimpses, and it seems to me that advocates of spiritual mapping take the concept far beyond the limits of biblical revelation. Fortunately, much of their research into the demonic activity of a city really does help them uncover the ethos of a geographical area. They can see the sinful tendencies and atmosphere of an area as they move in to evangelize, but to seek to name and exorcize demons should not and, as far as I can tell from their writings, does not deflect from the task of moral persuasion as they present the gospel as a challenge to a particular culture.

Clinton Arnold has written an excellent analysis of the phenomenon known as "strategic-level spiritual warfare," associated with C. Peter Wagner and others. In his book Three Crucial Questions About Spiritual Warfare, 22 he both affirms and criticizes the practices of people who engage in a deliverance and spiritual-mapping ministry. He speaks from deep knowledge of Scripture, having written a number of scholarly studies of the biblical material as well as dialogued closely with Wagner and other practitioners. I recommend his book heartily for those who wish to probe this issue more deeply.

Perhaps the two most important conclusions that Arnold reaches in regard to the issue before us are these: (1) The Bible affirms demonic activity and the relationship between demons and specific geographical locations; (2) "of even greater significance ... is the fact that the Bible nowhere narrates, describes, or instructs us on how, or even whether, we are to engage these high-ranking territorial spirits." In regard to the second point, we should note that Daniel never engages or prays against the spiritual enemies about which the celestial beings speak. He leaves those matters to God.

In the midst of a controversial issue, we must not forget the central teaching of Daniel 10: the amazing truth that God's people are not in the conflict alone. The Bible as a whole calls us to the life of a warrior in a world of conflict. But God does not send us out to fight on our own or even to pool our resources with other Christians. No, he sent his Son to first win the battle. He defeated evil by dying on the cross. He shows us that the way of victory is through love and sacrifice, not hate and greed. He gives us confidence to face abuse today because "our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us," when he comes to rescue us for the last time (Rom. 8:18).

Daniel 11:2–12:13

²Now then, I tell you the truth: Three more kings will appear in Persia, and then a fourth, who will be far richer than all the others. When he has gained power by his wealth, he will stir up everyone against the kingdom of Greece. ³Then a mighty king will appear, who will rule with great power and do as he pleases. ⁴After he has appeared, his empire will be broken up and parceled out toward the four winds of heaven. It will not go to his descendants, nor will it have the power he exercised, because his empire will be uprooted and given to others.

5"The king of the South will become strong, but one of his commanders will become even stronger than he and will rule his own kingdom with great power. ⁶After some years, they will become allies. The daughter of the king of the South will go to the king of the North to make an alliance, but she will not retain her power, and he and his power will not last. In those days she will be handed over, together with her royal escort and her father and the one who supported her.

⁷"One from her family line will arise to take her place. He will attack the forces of the king of the North and enter his fortress; he will fight against them and be victorious. ⁸He will also seize their gods, their metal images and their valuable articles of silver and gold and carry them off to Egypt. For some years he will leave the king of the North alone. ⁹Then the king of the North will invade the realm of the king of the South but will retreat to his own country. ¹⁰His sons will prepare for war and assemble a great army, which will sweep on like an irresistible flood and carry the battle as far as his fortress.

11"Then the king of the South will march out in a rage and fight against the king of the North, who will raise a large army, but it will be defeated.

12When the army is carried off, the king of the South will be filled with pride and will slaughter many thousands, yet he will not remain triumphant. 13For the king of the North will muster another army, larger than the first; and after several years, he will advance with a huge army fully equipped.

14"In those times many will rise against the king of the South. The violent men among your own people will rebel in fulfillment of the vision, but without success. ¹⁵Then the king of the North will come and build up siege ramps and will capture a fortified city. The forces of the South will be powerless to resist; even their best troops will not have the strength to stand. ¹⁶The invader will do as he pleases; no one will be able to stand against him. He will establish himself in the Beautiful Land and will have the power to destroy it. ¹⁷He will determine to come with the might of his entire kingdom and will make an alliance with the king of the South. And he will give him a daughter in marriage in order to overthrow the kingdom, but his plans will not succeed or help him. ¹⁸Then he will turn his attention to the coastlands and will take many of them, but a commander will put an end to his insolence and will turn his insolence back upon him. ¹⁹After this, he will turn back toward the fortresses of his own country but will stumble and fall, to be seen no more.

²⁰"His successor will send out a tax collector to maintain the royal splendor. In a few years, however, he will be destroyed, yet not in anger or in battle.

who has not been given the honor of royalty. He will invade the kingdom when its people feel secure, and he will seize it through intrigue. ²²Then an overwhelming army will be swept away before him; both it and a prince of the covenant will be destroyed. ²³After coming to an agreement with him, he will act deceitfully, and with only a few people he will rise to power. ²⁴When the richest provinces feel secure, he will invade them and will achieve what neither his fathers nor his forefathers did. He will distribute plunder, loot and wealth among his followers. He will plot the overthrow of fortresses—but only for a time.

25"With a large army he will stir up his strength and courage against the king of the South. The king of the South will wage war with a large and very powerful army, but he will not be able to stand because of the plots devised against him. ²⁶Those who eat from the king's provisions will try to destroy him; his army will be swept away, and many will fall in battle. ²⁷The two kings, with their hearts bent on evil, will sit at the same table and lie to each other, but to no avail, because an end will still come at the appointed time. ²⁸The king of the North will return to his own country with great wealth, but his heart will be set against the holy covenant. He will take action against it and then return to his own country.

²⁹"At the appointed time he will invade the South again, but this time the outcome will be different from what it was before. ³⁰Ships of the western coastlands will oppose him, and he will lose heart. Then he will turn back and vent his fury against the holy covenant. He will return and show favor to those who forsake the holy covenant.

³¹"His armed forces will rise up to desecrate the temple fortress and will abolish the daily sacrifice. Then they will set up the abomination that causes desolation. ³²With flattery he will corrupt those who have violated the covenant, but the people who know their God will firmly resist him.

³³"Those who are wise will instruct many, though for a time they will fall by the sword or be burned or captured or plundered. ³⁴When they fall, they will receive a little help, and many who are not sincere will join them. ³⁵Some of the wise will stumble, so that they may be refined, purified and made spotless until the time of the end, for it will still come at the appointed time.

magnify himself above every god and will say unheard-of things against the God of gods. He will be successful until the time of wrath is completed, for what has been determined must take place. ³⁷He will show no regard for the gods of his fathers or for the one desired by women, nor will he regard any god, but will exalt himself above them all. ³⁸Instead of them, he will honor a god of fortresses; a god unknown to his fathers he will honor with gold and silver, with precious stones and costly gifts. ³⁹He will attack the mightiest fortresses with the help of a foreign god and will greatly honor those who acknowledge him. He will make them rulers over many people and will distribute the land at a price.

⁴⁰"At the time of the end the king of the South will engage him in battle, and the king of the North will storm out against him with chariots and cavalry and a great fleet of ships. He will invade many countries and sweep through them like a flood. ⁴¹He will also invade the Beautiful Land. Many countries will fall, but Edom, Moab and the leaders of Ammon will be delivered from his hand. ⁴²He will extend his power over many countries; Egypt will not escape. ⁴³He will gain control of the treasures of gold and silver and all the riches of Egypt, with the Libyans and Nubians in submission. ⁴⁴But reports from the east and the north will alarm him, and he will set out in a great rage to destroy and annihilate many. ⁴⁵He will pitch his royal tents between the seas at the beautiful holy mountain. Yet he will come to his end, and no one will help him.

12:1"At that time Michael, the great prince who protects your people, will arise. There will be a time of distress such as has not happened from the beginning of nations until then. But at that time your people—everyone whose name is found written in the book—will be delivered. ²Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt. ³Those who are wise will shine like the brightness of the heavens, and those who lead many to righteousness, like the stars for ever and ever. ⁴But you, Daniel, close up and seal the words of the scroll until the time of the end. Many will go here and there to increase knowledge."

⁵Then I, Daniel, looked, and there before me stood two others, one on this bank of the river and one on the opposite bank. ⁶One of them said to the man clothed in linen, who was above the waters of the river, "How long will it be before these astonishing things are fulfilled?"

⁷The man clothed in linen, who was above the waters of the river, lifted his right hand and his left hand toward heaven, and I heard him swear by him who lives forever, saying, "It will be for a time, times and half a time. When the power of the holy people has been finally broken, all these things will be completed."

⁸I heard, but I did not understand. So I asked, "My lord, what will the outcome of all this be?"

⁹He replied, "Go your way, Daniel, because the words are closed up and sealed until the time of the end. ¹⁰Many will be purified, made spotless and refined, but the wicked will continue to be wicked. None of the wicked will understand, but those who are wise will understand.

¹¹"From the time that the daily sacrifice is abolished and the abomination that causes desolation is set up, there will be 1,290 days. ¹²Blessed is the one who waits for and reaches the end of the 1,335 days.

¹³"As for you, go your way till the end. You will rest, and then at the end of the days you will rise to receive your allotted inheritance."

Original Meaning

Daniel 11:2–12:13 contains the second and third parts of the larger unit begun in Daniel 10:1 (i.e., 10:1–12:13, which concludes the book of Daniel). Chapter 10 introduced the circumstances surrounding the vision; these next two sections contain the contents of that message and a concluding dialogue between Daniel and two heavenly beings.

The vision of part 2 (11:2–12:4) is unlike any that have preceded it in Daniel. It begins with a lengthy prophecy about unnamed kings and their actions. While there is nothing similar to this prophecy in the Old Testament, we have examples from the broader ancient Near East, the most notable parallel being the so-called Dynastic Prophecy. This genre of prophecy, not using personal names, reads the details of history closely. Daniel 11 covers a period from the Persian period to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. From what we know about the period we can affirm that the prophet writes with the accuracy of a historian. As a matter of fact, that is what many scholars feel is going on in this passage. That is, Daniel 11 is not a forward-looking prophecy from the standpoint of the sixth century B.C., but rather a backward-looking history cast in the literary form of prophecy.

The arguments in favor of the latter view are strong. As we will see in our exposition, one reading of the chapter understands 11:40–45 to apply to the same king, Antiochus Epiphanes IV, as described in verses 21–39. The only problem is that, while we can confirm the historical accuracy of the description of this king in the first part, verses 40–45 appear to be an attempt at actual prophecy rather than history in prophetic form. The point made is that we can tell actual prophecy from quasi-prophecy because the former fails.

Even though the prophecy fails, many scholars who have a high regard for the Bible provide rationale for why such literature exists in the Word of God.³ These scholars represent one legitimate attempt to deal with a difficult exegetical problem. One of the foundations of a typical defense of the presence of "prophecy after the fact" in the Bible is that it is a well-known genre of literature in the ancient Near East. It is precisely with this argument that I have found myself unable to follow and accept this line of reasoning. It is indeed true that this genre of literature is well known in the ancient Near East, if we mean by this that it is well attested. However, for this type of literature to work—that is, if it is to achieve its intended effect on an audience—they cannot know that it is quasi-prophecy. In order to build up the reader's confidence that God controls history and that he is sovereign over the future, the reader must believe that the prophecy is precisely that.⁴

The reading below assumes that Daniel 11 is actual prophecy. However, I admit up front that the explanation given for the transition from Antiochus IV to a future antichrist figure is not a particularly strong one. In short, there are no clear textual signals that there is a change of referent as we move from verse 39 to verse 40. There are subtle indicators, such as the mention of the "time of the end" and the increased use of mythical materials, but we must be aware of the tenuousness of our interpretation and allow room for difference of opinion on this point of interpretation among those who affirm the truth of the Word of God.

Part 2 ends on a strong note of hope, at least for those who agree with Daniel. As we will see, we get the first and only Old Testament reference to double resurrection in 12:2–3. Not only will the righteous rise to their reward, but the wicked will meet their punishment.

Part 3 functions as a kind of appendix and could be given a separate entry in the commentary. However, for reasons of convenience, we will treat 12:5–13 with what immediately precedes it. It is linked with chapters 10–12 by bringing us back to the scene at the river, with the heavenly being's hovering over the middle of the river. Now there are clearly two other angelic beings, and the book concludes with a final dialogue between Daniel and these supernatural beings.

We will study this unit of Daniel guided by the following outline: (1) Persia and Greece (11:2–4); (2) struggles between the kings of the North and the kings of the South (11:5–20); (3) the climactic king of the North (11:21–35); (4) the king who will do as he pleases (11:36–45); (5) the salvation of God's people (12:1–4); (6) final words (12:5–13).

Persia and Greece (11:2–4)

IT MAY SEEM odd that the angel begins by asserting that what he says is true. Would Daniel have expected anything else? Of course not, but the statement reminds us that we are to imagine Daniel in the sixth century hearing detailed events that cover the next few centuries. As we look back with our *Cambridge Ancient History*⁵ or its equivalent, we do not need much convincing. In our commentary we will supply names and specific events for the prophecies as they move from the time of Daniel to the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. The specific events are so well documented that we will not footnote the connections we make between the prophecies and the actual events. Such may be found in any reputable history of the period.

The angel begins with the assertion that three more kings will appear in Persia, and then a fourth. Now, unless we are willing to admit that Daniel knew the history of the Seleucid period perfectly but the Persian period inadequately, we must not understand this statement to mean that only four Persian kings ruled after the first, namely, Cyrus.⁶ Conceivably, the four kings include Cyrus and refer to the only four Persian kings mentioned in the Bible (Cyrus, Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes, cf. Ezra 4:5–7), but this is doubtful. After all, the reference suggests four kings besides Cyrus.

We are not certain either who the fourth king is, the one who "will be far richer than all the others" (v. 2). He is also characterized as the one who will "stir up everyone against the kingdom of Greece." Our first thought, and perhaps the best guess, is Xerxes I (486–465 B.C.). This Persian was a great and powerful king, and it is arguable that he set off the chain of events that over a century later led to the downfall of Persia at the hands of the Greeks, for he chose to invade areas controlled by Greeks. He failed at this attempt, being defeated at Salamis in 480 B.C., but his actions led to a Greek-Persian conflict that ended with Alexander.

The other candidate for the fourth Persian king is the last Persian emperor, Darius III (336–330 B.C.), who was the one who fell to Alexander. He was not the richest, but he was the one to fall. Miller puts forward an attractive hypothesis, though again not provable because it does not take us even close to the fall of Persia, that the three kings are those that follow Cyrus in succession (Cambyses, Smerdis, and Darius I Hystaspes) and that the fourth is Xerxes I.⁷ To be frank, however, we cannot be sure how to construe the mind of the author at this stage.

This verse is one of the few ambiguities in the chapter. We know with certainty the identity of the "mighty king" of verse 3—none other than Alexander, whom we call "the Great." But as soon as he came on the scene, he disappeared from it. Alexander was king of Macedon, succeeding his father Philip, in 336 B.C., and by 330 he had conquered Persia. He continued his conquests and reached the Indus, but died in 323, leaving his mentally challenged half brother Philip III and his son Alexander IV in charge. These two were under the guidance of Perdiccas. All three were eventually murdered: Perdiccas in 321, Philip III in 317, and Alexander IV in 311. Power passed into the hands of Alexander's four leading generals—thus the reference in verse 4 to the "four winds of heaven."

Since Daniel is concerned with the people of God, focus immediately shifts to two of the Diadochoi (or "Successors," as the four were known), those who had their power base in Syria (the kings of the north) and those who had their power base in Egypt (the kings of the south). In the north, the rulers eventually became known as the Seleucid dynasty, and in the south ruled the Ptolemies. Judah was right in the middle, and the story of the third and second centuries B.C. is an account of how Judah passed back and forth between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids.

Struggles Between the Kings of the North and the Kings of the South (11:5–20)

THE STORY OF the Ptolemies and Seleucids begins in earnest in verse 5. To start, the king of the south is Ptolemy I. He had taken Egypt from the point of Alexander's death. The king of the north was Seleucus I. Upon Perdiccas's assassination (421 B.C.), he was given the satrapy of Babylon, but in 316 had sought refuge with Ptolemy in Egypt to avoid conflict with another powerful Diadochi, Antigonus. When Ptolemy and Seleucus defeated Antigonus in Gaza in 312, Seleucus returned to Babylon. In 301 B.C. at the Battle of Ipsus the struggles between the various Diadochi were resolved when the elderly Antigonus and his son Demetrius were defeated. It was at this time that Syria-Palestine was assigned to Seleucus. However, his long-standing ally Ptolemy moved against his holdings and occupied Palestine. Seleucus and his successors never gave up claim to this area, however, so there was now tension between the two that would play itself out to the end of the period.⁸

Some years later (ca. 250 B.C.) a dynastic marriage was planned, presumably to soothe matters between the two royal houses (cf. v. 6). Ptolemy II Philadelphus gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II Theos, who was the grandson of Seleucus. Antiochus II had divorced his first wife, Laodice, to marry Berenice. A son, whose name we do not know, was born of the second union, but then Antiochus reconciled with Laodice, who promptly had her husband, Berenice, and her son poisoned; thus, "she will not retain her power" (v. 6).

Needless to say, these actions did not help the relationship between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies. In verse 7 we have an allusion to the fact that Ptolemy III Euergetes, Berenice's brother, came to the throne in 246 B.C. and waged war against the son of Laodice, Seleucus II Callinicus, who had inherited the northern throne. In the process of the successful campaign, Ptolemy III stole the images of the gods and returned them to Egypt. However, his success was not long-lived for Seleucus II attacked the south and, though he did not take Egypt, recovered his land. The battles continued.

The sons of Seleucus II Callinicus, alluded to in verse 10, are Seleucus III Cerannus, who ruled from 227–223 B.C., and one of the most famous of all the Seleucid rulers, Antiochus III the Great, who had a long reign from

223–187. In the south Ptolemy IV Philopator took the throne but was not up to the task; thus, Antiochus III got back large tracts of his land. Daniel 11:10 says that he was successful "as far as his fortress." We cannot be certain about this reference. Driver claimed this is a playful reference to Gaza, which is on the doorstep to Egypt, while Montgomery argued that the phrase means that he was hostile toward the fortress, which would make it a reference to Egypt itself.⁹

The story of Antiochus III the Great's reign continues through verse 19. The significance given to his reign likely has much to do with the fact that it was through his agency that Palestine finally shifted from Ptolomaic control to Seleucid control, thus setting the scene for the horrors of his son's reign (cf. below on vv. 21ff.).

Verse 11 describes what has come to be known as the battle of Raphia in 217 B.C., between Antiochus III and Ptolemy IV.¹⁰ In 218 Antiochus was steadily advancing in Coele-Syria and in the winter set up his headquarters in the city of Ptolemais. The next summer (June 22, 217 B.C., to be exact), Ptolemy IV and Antiochus III met in Raphia in the most southern part of Palestine. The Ptolemaic side had the advantage in numbers and won the day. Antiochus retreated to his capital in Antioch.

Ptolemy won the battle, but it would be relatively short-lived. He did not follow up his victory, but allowed Antiochus to lick his wounds. Of course, it may not have been logistically possible for Ptolemy to do any more than that. Furthermore, for the first time the Ptolemies used native Egyptian troops for the war, and not long afterward the native Egyptians were exercising their newfound sense of power and rebelling against the ruling foreign house. These revolts added an element of internal instability to the picture for the Ptolemies.

Antiochus began to recover a few years later, and he exerted his efforts to the eastern part of his empire and recovered land that had been lost on that front. That kept him occupied from 212–205 B.C. In 204 suddenly Ptolemy IV and his queen died. Ptolemy IV was only thirty-five at the time of his death and his son and heir, Ptolemy V (who would receive the cognomen Epiphanes) was about six years old. Antiochus felt that the time was right to press the advantage against his old enemy in Egypt. While Ptolemy V was young, the real power was a high official named Agathocles, who was not popular in Egypt because of his heavy-handed policies.

The first engagement did not go well for Antiochus III; Scopas, the Ptolomaic general, beat him back. But in 200 B.C. at the battle of Panium (later called Caesarea Philippi), Antiochus won a decisive victory. After a century of Ptolemaic rule, Syria-Palestine came under the control of the Seleucids.

Verse 14 is obscure in detail, but acknowledges that these great events caused turmoil among the Jewish people. We are not sure to whom the "violent men" refer, but we do know there were political power plays going on at the time in Jerusalem. The Oniads controlled the high priesthood and supported Egyptian rule, but the Tobiads, a politically powerful family related by marriage to the Oniads, leaned in the opposite direction. Again, we are not even sure about what is meant by "vision." It may even be that some took heart at the prophecies of Daniel, giving them courage to think they were at the time when the end of foreign oppression was to arrive. They may have taken matters into their own hands, but failed. We cannot be certain.

Whereas Ptolemy IV did not follow up his victory at Raphia with Antiochus III, Antiochus pursued Scopas to Sidon; this is likely the reference in verse 15. Collins suggests that the "best troops" indicates Scopas's Aetolian mercenary troops."

In verse 16 Daniel notes that the victor began to get heady and perhaps overconfident. Earlier we heard this about Alexander just before his death (v. 3), and later we will hear it about another king (v. 36). Soon we will observe that, like Alexander, Antiochus III's rule would not last forever either, and he would have a terrible end.

But in the meantime he set himself up in the "Beautiful Land," which of course is Palestine (Dan. 8:9; 11:41; cf. Jer. 3:19). Antiochus then decided on an age-old strategy to keep his opponents in line—the institution of dynastic marriage. He gave his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy V in marriage with the hopes that she would incline his heart toward his father-in-law and serve as a kind of ambassador-spy in the potentially hostile empire of Egypt. However, as our verse seems to indicate, the plot did not come to fruition as Antiochus had hoped. Cleopatra, as sometimes happened in these dynastic marriages, placed, if not her affections, at least her self-interest with her husband. Indeed, she became the leading power in Egypt after the death of her husband in 182, and her son Ptolemy VI Philometer succeeded her eight years later.

Antiochus never tired of ambition, and in accordance with the prophecy of verse 18 started annexing parts of Asia Minor as well as some Greek islands. In 196 B.C. he encroached on Thrace. All of this began to arouse the attention of the new power in that part of the world, Rome. He did not obey Roman warnings, so the Roman senate sent the consul Lucius Cornelius Scipio against him. Antiochus was defeated at Thermopylae in 191 and Magnesia in 190. He then had to retreat to the core of his empire. He had been reduced to stealing precious materials from the temple of Bel at Elymais, and he died in 187.

His son Seleucus IV Philopator (187–175) succeeded him, but he was not popular because of the burden he put on the people to raise the tribute to keep the Romans off his back. One of his ministers was a man named Heliodorus. According to 2 Maccabees 3 he was the one who tried to sack the temple in Jerusalem. Seleucus IV died under mysterious circumstances just as his younger brother, who had been made a hostage in Rome after the battle of Magnesia, was returning to his homeland. That younger brother's name was Antiochus IV, who got the nickname Epiphanes. The attention of the text turns now to this highly significant figure.

The Climactic King of the North (11:21–35)

ACCORDING TO DANIEL, the struggles between the south (Ptolemaic Egypt) and the north (Seleucid Syria) culminated with one ruler, a "contemptible person" (v. 21). The prophecy's assessment of his importance and his character is based exclusively on the turmoil that his rule created in Jerusalem. This man greatly offended the orthodox Jewish sensibilities of his time. For this, he became paradigmatic of human power that exalts itself with disregard for God himself. We will see that his actions are considered paradigmatic with ultimate wickedness toward the end of the chapter.

We left the story in verse 20, with the mysterious death of Seleucus IV in 175 B.C., while Antiochus was en route to Syria after being a hostage in Rome. When Antiochus IV was allowed to leave Rome, he was replaced by Demetrius, his nephew, who would have been his father's successor. Antiochus received the news of his brother's death while in Athens. He also heard that Heliodorus, perhaps behind the death of Seleucus, was plotting to seize power. Antiochus rushed home to come to the aid of another nephew, who was also named Antiochus. On the way back, he received the support of Eumenes, the king of Pergamum, who wanted to support the native dynasty over a pretender like Heliodorus. Antiochus, with this help, reached Antioch and ruled for the next five years as coregent with young Antiochus. In 170 B.C., the latter died and Antiochus IV ruled alone.

There is some disagreement among commentators over the sequence of verses 22–24. Collins believes that verse 22 is a general statement about Antiochus IV's reign with a dischronologized reference to the deposition of Onias III from the high priesthood (see below), then verses 23–24 go back to describing Antiochus's initial takeover of Seleucia from his nephew. Miller, on the other hand, feels that verses 22–24 are chronological and discuss the first phase of the Syrian-Egyptian war. He thus asserts that Ptolemy VI is the "prince of the covenant" mentioned in verse 22. If find the latter improbable and so side with Collins.

It is also unclear exactly what is in view in verse 23. The ambiguous language does not allow us to be dogmatic as to whether it is still referring to Antiochus's coming to power in Syria with the help of a "few people" (Eumenes being the most notable as well as his brother Attalus, so Collins) or his gaining influence in Jerusalem.¹⁴ The story behind the latter is as follows.

Onias III was high priest, not only the most important religious position in Jerusalem at the time but also the highest political office. He was, however, pro-Egyptian. The Tobiad family was an extremely powerful force in the city. They were not native, having emigrated from across the river some years before. With them, in a pro-Syrian (and thus pro-Antiochus IV) party, was Jason, Onias's brother and thus a member of the priestly family. The pro-Syrian party wanted to turn Jerusalem into a Greek city. Antiochus was much better off with Jason rather than Onias in the high priesthood and manipulated the situation so that Jason assumed that position. Such manipulation of that sacred office brought on the displeasure of the faithful and was really just the beginning. Such a reward for Jason and the Tobiads was probably in the mind of the prophet when he spoke of Antiochus's beneficence in verse 24.

Verse 25 turns our attention now to Antiochus's actions against the south. Polybius tells us that it was actually the south that was the aggressor, but the pivotal first battle took place as the northern army passed into southern territory. The political situation in the south was that, after the death of Cleopatra the wife of Ptolemy V, who served as regent until 176 B.C., her young son Ptolemy VI Philometer took the throne. Two of his advisors were the real power, however, Eulaeus and Lenaeus. They were the ones who initiated a new anti-Syrian policy, and Antiochus was likely making a preemptive strike against them. The battle was joined south of Gaza near Pelusium, and Antiochus won the day. Ptolemy was a young man at the time and the defeat was probably to be blamed on the two advisors, who may be the referent to the phrase "those who eat from the king's provisions" (v. 26).

Ptolemy VI's younger brother, Ptolemy VII, declared himself king in Alexandria, while Ptolemy VI ruled from Memphis. Antiochus failed at his attempt to take Alexandria and returned to the north, leaving some troops behind just outside of Egypt proper. Those troops apparently were needed since the very next year (168 B.C.) he invaded Egypt again (v. 29). The two Ptolemy brothers had reconciled and stood as a united front. More telling against Antiochus was the intervention of Rome. The consul Popillius Laenas came and presented him with a senatorial decision that he remove himself from Egypt. According to Mandell and Hayes, he was a legate without consular imperium. However, in a show of force, the Roman legate drew a circle in the sand around Antiochus and told him that he must make a decision before leaving the circle. This must have been extremely embarrassing to Antiochus, but he knew better than to disobey. So he withdrew, probably none too happy; and he, of course, returned via Judea.

I have passed over verse 28b in order to talk about Antiochus's second Egyptian campaign and for a reason. There is some confusion in the sources (e.g., 1 and 2 Maccabees) about what happened when. For our purposes, it is only important to point out that Antiochus took increasingly aggressive steps against what God's faithful people would call proper worship. For one thing he looted the temple. He also had a fortress erected (called the Akra) near the temple in order to keep an eye on the activities there. Most distressing was his stopping the daily sacrifice on the altar and placing in the temple an idolatrous object, probably a meteorite representing Baal Shamem (the Syrian version of Zeus). This object is called "the abomination that causes desolation" in the book of Daniel. According to Mandell and Hayes, it "was constructed upon the altar of burnt offerings in the Temple courtyard. It was on this altar and similar ones outside Jerusalem that swine were said to have been offered (1 Macc. 1:44–47; Ant. XII 253) after the cessation of the traditional, daily tamid sacrifices."¹⁷

The people of God were split into two parties (v. 32): those who supported Antiochus and his program of Hellenization of Judea and those who did not. Jason had earlier been removed from the high priesthood and replaced by a person named Menelaus, who was not even a member of the right family to be a priest. But he was probably supported by the powerful Tobiads and simply outbid Jason for the position. However, while Antiochus was waging his second Egyptian campaign, Jason, the deposed high priest, heard a rumor that Antiochus had been killed and so he moved against Menelaus. However, Antiochus, upset about the frustrations of his plans in Egypt, was far from dead. Thus, upon his return he acted against God's people. He had many massacred and sold as slaves.

The real heroes during this time of distress are the "wise," who will instruct the "many" (v. 33). They are those who would be on Daniel's religious wavelength. There is some disagreement over how the "wise" are related to the Hasmoneans or whether the latter are referred to as the "little help," or whether there is any connection at all. The debate has to do with how the book of Daniel views an active, violent reaction to their oppression. I believe it is wrong-minded to say that the book of Daniel represents a pacifist view that waits for God the warrior to act. In the earlier historical battles of Israel, God won the war, to be sure, at places like Jericho, but that did not mean that Israel did not take action in some way. In other words, the ideology of the book has plenty of room for appreciation of armed resistance to the oppression.

The King Who Will Do As He Pleases (11:36–45)

Anyone who does not acknowledge a difficulty here is a polemicist in the worst possible sense. That is, he or she knows better that this is a difficult passage one way or the other, and not to acknowledge the difficulty and not to allow for tolerance for the other view is simply bad faith. The issue is: Who is in mind in verses 36–45? Further complicating the issue is the question of whose "mind" are we referring to, the human author or the divine author? It is our understanding of the nature of revelation (cf. 1 Peter 1:10–12) that the human author did not fully understand the implications of what he was speaking about. In other words, it is conceivable that Daniel thought he was still describing the climactic king of the north, whom he has been speaking about since verse 21 and whom we have identified as Antiochus IV Epiphanes, but the divine intention may have been much broader.

There are several signals for a broader intention. (1) The language takes on bigger-than-life terms. As Clifford (who does not follow us in assigning an eschatological meaning to these verses) puts it, we get mythical, cosmic language here, that is, language that lifts us above mundane, earthly activity. (2) We have the language of the "time of the end" (v. 40). This takes us to the edge of history, which, of course, was not achieved at the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, as horrible as his reign was. (3) Finally, we know that verses 40–45 simply do not work when applied to the life and death of Antiochus Epiphanes. Antiochus did not "extend his power over many countries; Egypt will not escape" (v. 42). Nor did he die when he "pitch[ed] his royal tents between the seas at the beautiful holy mountain" (v. 45).

The latter is what drives certain scholars, some with an indisputably orthodox view of Scripture, 19 to opt for a late date of the book of Daniel. They often do so on the grounds that a "prophecy after the fact" is a well-known ancient literary genre. That the genre is well attested is true; however, they are wrong to think it was recognized by contemporary audiences as prophecy after the fact. The comparable examples of prophecy after the fact only worked if their authors could deceive their audiences into thinking they were written ages ago. My research into this genre and this particular use of pseudonymity keeps me from going in the direction of these scholars. However, it would be disingenuous of me to suggest that there are not strong arguments that support their view. Also, it is mischievous of other scholars to suggest that somehow their views are indications that they are not consistently evangelical in their approach to the Bible.

Why not assert, on the basis of the textual signals described above, that this prophecy is of the Antichrist, pure and simple? The difficulty is that there is no clear transitional statement between verses 35 and 36 or later between verses 39 and 40. In the earlier part of the chapter, there are clear signals that the narrator moves from one king to the next (cf. vv. 2, 7, 20– 21), but not in the present section. Here we have the primary textual reason why we cannot simply rule out of court the argument that verses 36–45 continue the "prophecy" of Antiochus Epiphanes.

There are views, of course, that are over the edge. For instance, some embrace the idea that the author of Daniel, living in the middle of the second century B.C., was intentionally working a fraud by presenting his prophecy as coming from the sixth century. In this case, the end of Daniel 11 is nothing but a failed attempt at predicting the future.

However, as mentioned above, my own opinion is that Daniel is speaking from the sixth century and is looking into the future. It is from this perspective that I will interpret the verses. The perspective followed here has found brief but articulate expression in the commentary by Baldwin.²¹ She begins by reminding us that biblical prophecy often exhibited the characteristic of telescoping future events. The image conjured by this term is that of a collapsible telescope—one that looked like a short one-piece tube until extended, revealing three parts. In the same way, biblical prophecy was often presented as one event, but as we witness its fulfillment we see that it was really more complex than that.²²

Baldwin cites the prophecy of Jesus in Mark 13 and its Synoptic parallels. Reading it in a later period of time we see that elements of it were fulfilled in an anticipatory way in the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, but that it also looked forward to the time that we are all still anticipating, the second coming of Christ. In the same way, John the Baptist's description of the one whom he would baptize was clearly fulfilled in Christ's first coming in one sense, but awaits the Second Coming for further fulfillment. John's own doubts expressed in Matthew 11:1–19 demonstrate as well that in this case the prophet spoke better than he consciously knew. Thus, in Daniel 11:36–45 we see references to Antiochus Epiphanes taking on larger than life characteristics, which we, living in the light of the New Testament, might describe as anticipatory of a figure called the Antichrist.²³

The pride of this king will be enormous. He will exalt himself not only above every other human being, but above the gods themselves. His pride, as well as his fall, equals that of the morning star in Isaiah 14:12–14:

O morning star, son of the dawn!... You said in your heart, "I will ascend to heaven;
I will raise my throne
above the stars of God;
I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain.
I will ascend above the tops of the clouds;
I will make myself like the Most High."24

As a king, the Antichrist not only has pride, but he also has power, which leads him to assert his own sovereignty so that he will "do as he pleases." As such, he attacks the gods. Interestingly, he is castigated not only for rejecting the true God, but also for disdain showed toward his own ancestral religion, perhaps mentioned because it reinforces the idea that he is a man of incredible pride. "The one desired by women" is often an epithet of Tammuz, whose cult of the dying and rising god features a prominent place for women, but is more likely the Syrian reflex that features Adonis as the object of attention.

In an apparent contradiction, however, the passage goes on to describe how this king, who exalts himself above every god, pays homage to "a god of fortresses" (v. 38)—though this may simply be a reference to the attention he pays to his own military machine and his insatiable desire to oppress others. Of course, Antiochus with his lifelong desire to subjugate the south is a suitable model for this bigger-than-life king.

Verse 40 begins with the phrase "at the time of the end," begging the question "the end of what?" Certainly it means the end of the pride and life of the king who does as he pleases. Miller is correct to point out that this "end" is followed in 12:1–3 by the resurrection of the dead, and so we should take this as a clue that the end (in its ultimate sense) is the end of time. Miller, however, I believe errs by continuing to equate the details of the following verse to specific end-time events. At this stage of biblical revelation, we are getting some of the earliest glimpses of final things. The New Testament (see below) will provide much more on the final judgment. Yet even so, we are left today with only the taste of the great realities to come. We should be extremely cautious in our treatment of these truths.

Indeed, all I feel safe asserting is the following: Verses 40–45 look forward to a violent end to history. This end will see the destruction of the pride and arrogance of the wicked. The next section goes on to talk about the other side of the coin, the great eschatological reward for those who are on God's side in the conflict.

The Salvation of God's People (12:1–4)

THE CHAPTER DIVISION obscures the fact that 12:1—4 is integrally connected with what preceded at the end of chapter 11. The king who resisted the gods and exalted himself (11:36—45) has come to a pitiful end. We have argued above that this previous section telescopes earthly and cosmic realities as well as near-future and far-future events. The king is Antiochus, but he is also something more (i.e., worse) than Antiochus. The end is in the second century, but the end is also in the still-distant future. Just as the ideal king of the Psalms was grounded in the Davidic reality but anticipated the Messianic glory, so the wicked king of the end of Daniel is grounded in the Antiochene reality but anticipated the horror of the Antichrist.

Thus, when chapter 12 begins "at that time," we find ourselves again in that flux between earthly and heavenly reality. We deal with the definitive end of Antiochus's persecution of God's people as well as their final struggle. We are, in a phrase, at "the theological climax of the book."²⁵

We have been introduced to Michael already (see 10:13, 21) as God's warring angel, the "patron angel of Israel." Verse 1 has military and judicial overtones. Michael judges and fights in order to protect God's people. This comes at a time of unprecedented "distress," but the distress is no sooner announced than the fact of deliverance is introduced.

This deliverance is spelled out in more detail in verse 2, a truly amazing verse about which Towner declares, "There it is, the first and only unambiguous reference to the double resurrection of the dead in the entire Old Testament!" There may be others (cf. Isa. 26:19), but we agree that this is the clearest. Even so, we are left with many questions if we restrict ourselves to Daniel 12 without recourse to later New Testament teaching about the topic of the afterlife. Of course, we must not develop a whole doctrine of the afterlife from this one verse. But we can confidently affirm that it celebrates the vindication that will come both in the reward for which the righteous are destined and in the punishment for which the wicked—by which we are to understand those who have worked against the purposes and people of God—are reserved.

The righteous are described as "those who are wise" (v. 3) and may indeed have as their reference those belonging to Daniel's group or the teachers among them. They will shine "like the brightness of the heavens," presumably "like the stars," which in other contexts stand for celestial beings (Judg. 5:20; Job 38:7; 1 Enoch 104; T. Moses 10:9; 2 Apoc. Bar. 51). This hope is expressed as a metaphor, however, and we should not press the language literally.

This great hope is to be preserved through the ages, not hidden. Miller understands the force of verse 4 correctly when he states an earlier biblical analogy:

In the ancient Near East the custom was to "seal" an important document by impressing upon it the identifying marks of the parties involved and the recording scribe. A sealed text was not to be tampered with or changed. The original document was duplicated and placed ("closed up") in a safe place where it could be preserved.²⁸

Miller cites Jeremiah 32:9–12, where there are clearly two documents, one public and one preserved for posterity.

Therefore, the picture is not that of a document that becomes clearer to understand the closer we get to the end times, which will then constitute the unsealing of Daniel's prophecy. Indeed, the best understanding of the "many will go here and there to increase knowledge" is a negative one. Collins points out the allusion to Amos 8:12: "Men will stagger from sea to sea and wander from north to east, searching for the word of the LORD, but they will not find it," and comments that since the prophecy is sealed, this knowledge is unattainable.²⁹ That is, people will scurry about desperately trying to find knowledge in their own power, but will fail in their attempt.

Final Words (12:5–13)

SOME SCHOLARS BELIEVE that this section has the traits of a later gloss or appendix (see comments on vv. 11–12). But it is fitting, now that the message of prophecy has been delivered, to return to the scene and characters described in 10:4–21. We are back at the bank of the river, the celestial being still hovering over the water. Now, however, there are clearly two other figures (probably angelic) on each side of the river. One of the two is surely the angel who delivered the message (conceivably Gabriel, though unnamed both here and in ch. 10). The other angel is unnamed, but (and this is more of a stretch) he might be Michael, who was mentioned at the end of chapter 10 as the angel who helped fight the way to reach Daniel in the first place. These ambiguities, combined with the debate over the divine or angelic identity of the figure in linen, make the scene a bit murky, but this ambiguity does not affect the interpretation.

Daniel again finds himself in the position of overhearing a conversation between celestial beings. One of the angels on the bank addresses a climactic question to the other one, obviously the superior, hovering over the water: "How long will it be before these astonishing things are fulfilled?" (v. 6). This question, though delivered by the angel, would be of dire interest to Daniel and his spiritual heirs, who would find themselves in periods of distress. How long would the suffering last? A term closely related to the "astonishing things" (pela'ot) of verse 6 was used in 11:36 (nipla'ot, NIV, "unheard-of things"); thus, the immediate reference to the question in 12:6 may be what follows in 11:36–12:3. If so, as we have suggested, it may have a double reference to the time of Antiochus and the time of greater horror to follow.

Before answering, the hovering figure dressed in linen garments makes an unprecedented gesture (v. 7): He lifts both hands toward heaven and swears "by him who lives forever." In Deuteronomy 32:40, God lifts one hand to heaven and swears by himself who lives forever. The double-handed gesture, at least as far as we can tell, is a statement of emphasis and certainly evokes a solemn atmosphere around what is to follow.

This figure then delivers an enigmatic answer that reminds us of the answer given in 7:25: "a time, times and half a time" (12:7). As we saw there, the intention is not to give a precise time period but rather to indicate that just as wickedness seems to be gaining momentum, it will be slowed and then stopped. Such cessation will happen at a time of great distress, since it will be at the moment when "the power of the holy people has been finally broken." Deliverance comes at the most unlikely time. God seems to work that way. When human resources run out, God steps in to demonstrate his power.

But Daniel, like us, wants more information. Thus, he asks in verse 8, "My lord, what will the outcome of all this be?" The reply comes, not harshly but clearly, that now is not the time. The celestial being tells Daniel to get on with life ("Go your way," v. 9), and again he emphasizes the closed nature of the revelation (they are "closed up" and "sealed").

Nonetheless, he does expand his earlier comments on the period to follow (v. 10). We are, I believe, to take them as words that describe the period from Daniel's time to the end. The wicked will continue to be wicked and not understand, while those who are wise will understand. In the light of Daniel's own confession that he did not understand the words of the celestial being (v. 8), we should comment that the reference to lack of understanding is not to the enigmas of the end but rather to the wicked's not understanding the overall purposes of God's plan. They continue to be wicked because wickedness seems to win out. They do not see the long-term, eschatological perspective, where it is not the wicked who will have victory but the wise, the righteous, who rise to "everlasting life" (12:2). They will shine like stars, whereas the wicked will wake up to "everlasting contempt."

But the enigmas continue in verses 11–12. Two more time periods are specified. Both are impossible to pinpoint with real events or to correlate with each other. Is the reference to Antiochus, who abolished sacrifice and then set up an object that venerated Zeus in the temple? Is it to a future desecration perpetrated by the eschatological Antichrist? Is it both? All these views have been put forward.

Indeed, if the original reference of the angel's question in verse 6 was to the things described prophetically in 11:36–12:3, then perhaps we are still dealing with a conflation of Antiochus and the greater terror that follows in the future.³⁰ Antiochus, after all, abolished sacrifice and set up an abomination, and it was about three years before the temple was cleansed, thanks to the victory of the Maccabees. Perhaps the fact that all the numbers cited here are a little longer suggests that the text is pointing beyond that historical reference point to something still future to us. Jesus, we will see, certainly understands that to be the case (see below on his comments on the "abomination that causes desolation").³¹

What is the relationship of the 1290 days to the 1335 days (12:11–12) to the 2300 evenings and mornings (8:14) to the "time, times and half a time"

(7:25; 12:7; if understood as three and one half years, the day totals are in the ballpark with these other numbers)? God alone knows—and that seems to be the point. God knows that there is an end that he has determined, but we cannot figure it out because we are not supposed to. Leave it to God, the angel says to Daniel, and through him he speaks to us. Once again to Daniel, but also to us, he says: "Go your way till the end. You will rest, and then at the end of days you will rise to receive your allotted inheritance" (12:13).

This is a fitting conclusion for Daniel and for the book. You may suffer now, but God has given you a glimpse of the coming glory. God will set things right. Your reward is coming, but for now "go your way." By these words, God gives Daniel and all of his heirs the confidence to persist in the light of continuing persecution and trouble.

Bridging Contexts

DANIEL 11–12 PRESENTS the visionary message of the supernatural creatures who fought their way to Daniel in chapter 10. The concluding unit (12:5–13) finds Daniel and his celestial companions in the same place as in chapter 10 and brings this final unit to completion. As we have observed above, the visionary message looks with remarkable clarity into the near and far future. Names are not used, but from our position of historical retrospect, we can provide them along with a description of many of the events of the fourth to second century B.C. We recognize the events alluded to in chapter 11 through other sources like Polybius, Josephus, and 1 and 2 Maccabees.

This narrative is presented from the vantage point of the sixth century B.C. Even if Goldingay and other scholars are correct that the prophecy was actually composed in the second century B.C.,³² the book intends us to understand it to come from the sixth century. In either case, the book of Daniel makes a strong statement about the sovereignty of God over the historical process. If we have been reading straight through the book of Daniel, this will hardly surprise us. Every passage that we have studied has contributed to the overarching theme of the book: In spite of present circumstances, God is in control and will win the day.

Perhaps in no chapter is God's control displayed in such detail as in chapter 11. Indeed, for those of us living at a later time, it raises the issue of the meaning of history. If God is in such control, how can our decisions hold any meaning? Can I be held responsible for my actions if I am a mere puppet on a string held by an all-powerful being? Towner believes that the answer to the last question is no. In his often insightful commentary, he states that Daniel's theology of history means that it is "essentially meaningless.... History's only point then becomes simply to demonstrate that God's eternal decree is certain to come to pass."³³

Before exploring this issue of divine sovereignty and human responsibility, it is important to remind ourselves of the six major themes of the second half of the book, because most of them play an important role in this climactic prophetic vision. The six are:

- the horror of human evil, particularly as it is concentrated in the state
- the announcement of a specific time of deliverance
- repentance that leads to deliverance
- the revelation that a cosmic war stands behind human conflict
- judgment as certain for those who resist God and oppress his people
- the equally certain truth that God's people, downtrodden in the present, will experience new life in the fullest sense.

With the exception of the theme of repentance, we will have occasion to see all these themes displayed prominently in these two chapters. However, to complete our plan of focusing on a theme per chapter (see comments in "The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature" in the Original Meaning section of chapter 7), we will here explore carefully the last two elements: Judgment is certain for the wicked; reward is certain for the righteous.

Divine sovereignty and human responsibility. It is in the term certain that we get the connection with the issue of divine sovereignty. How can Daniel say that judgment and reward are certain for the wicked and the righteous? Because God is sovereign; he is in control.

This is why the issue of divine sovereignty over history was not a problem for Daniel or his readers. He was not approaching it as a philosophical problem, but rather proclaiming good news to a captive people. In the present, the wicked are in control and prospering, whereas the godly are suffering. But that is not the end of the story. Far from rendering history meaningless, it imbues it with ultimate significance. What would be meaningless is if all the suffering faithfulness of God's people resulted only in a nameless grave. What would lead to despair is if, after treading over the godly, the wicked would be celebrated in death.

Is not this the problem that the Teacher in Ecclesiastes expressed? To him, God was not in control, or at least he didn't seem to be. "God is in heaven and you are on earth" (Eccl. 5:2). For the godly, life is one pain after another, and then they die. For the wicked—well, let's listen to the words of the Teacher: "I saw the wicked buried—those who used to come and go from the holy place and receive praise in the city where they did this. This too is meaningless" (8:10).³⁴

For Daniel's audience, God's control of history was positive because it meant things would turn out right in the end. This knowledge led to joy in the present (cf. Ps. 73³⁵).

However, we cannot avoid the philosophical questions in this way completely. Does divine sovereignty eradicate human responsibility? Does God's control mean that human beings have none? Are we simply acting out a script already written? Certainly that is what Daniel 11 appears to be —a script for the history of the ancient Near East in the centuries between the beginning of Persian rule and down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Divine sovereignty and human responsibility—this is an old, old debate among theologians. And, I would be quick to add, its endurance as a point of contention warns us that the ultimate answer may be beyond our grasp. Another way to put it is, the Bible does not tell us enough to allow us to answer how these two work together in harmony.

What does the Bible teach us? It shows us, as we have seen clearly in Daniel, that God is in control. But it also informs us that human beings make decisions for which they are responsible. In the words of Philippians 2:12: "Therefore, my dear friends, as you have always obeyed—not only in my presence, but now much more in my absence—continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose."

God works out our salvation. We work out our salvation. God controls history; he brought Antiochus Epiphanes down and allowed the temple to be cleansed. Human beings act in history; the Hasmonean rebellion liberated the temple.

Now some people see Daniel as a quietist, as someone who would say, "God will take care of it" or "Let God...." They reason that Daniel would be against the Hasmonean rebellion or any overt actions that would try to wrest control out of the hands of God and into their own. I beg to differ. It is difficult to know what Daniel would have thought of Judas Maccabeus, but in principle he would not have been against him. That is, he would not reject out of hand human efforts. Daniel understood that divine sovereignty and human responsibility formed a mystery, but he also understood that they both were operative. He emphasizes the former because God's people were relatively powerless. Thus, the news of God's sovereignty was good news.

And indeed throughout the Bible, we see that God's control over history, while not eradicating human responsibility, was something that brought joy and confidence to his people. Let's begin with the story of Joseph.

The Joseph narrative has surprisingly little God-talk in it. As it narrates Joseph's movements from Palestine to Egypt, and from the house of Potiphar to jail and finally to Pharaoh's court, the narrator does not reflect on God's agency in his life. Joseph does the best that he can and then, or so it appears, the blind forces of chance push him around. However, that is not the way Joseph understands it, and from the climactic position of Joseph's final speech, it is not the way the narrator wants us to take it. In what must be understood as a thematic statement, Joseph speaks to his brothers, who are afraid that since Jacob has died, their brother will now work his revenge: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives. So then, don't be afraid. I will provide for you and your children. And he reassured them and spoke kindly to them" (Gen. 50:20–21). They meant evil against Joseph and were responsible, and were it not for their repentance, they would be punished; but God meant it for good. He used the sinful, selfish actions of the brothers to bring about the greater purpose of helping his people survive a crushing famine.

Samson is another case in point. A close study of the Samson narrative indicates that he did nothing unless it was for his own good. He was a self-absorbed man, if ever there was one. But God overruled his sinful tendencies to use him to harass the enemy, the Philistines, and ultimately to bring a huge disaster on their leadership. He married a Philistine woman, which brought him into conflict with the enemy, and he responded by burning their fields or killing a large number of them with the jawbone of an ass. Once he actually destroyed the gate of the Philistine city of Gath—a wonderful display of power over this arrogant enemy. But why did he tear it down with his superhuman strength? Because he was caught visiting a prostitute and he was holding the gate over his head to keep from getting killed!

Even the dramatic end of Samson's story is clouded, at best, with mixed motives. After Delilah's betrayal, he found himself in Philistine custody, bereft of his strength, blinded, and made a fool. As he stood bound to a pillar, he made one final request of God: "O Sovereign LORD, remember me. O God, please strengthen me just once more, and let me with one blow get revenge on the Philistines for my two eyes" (Judg. 16:28). He then brought down the house—literally—on the heads of the Philistines, as well as his own. Again, a great victory over the enemy, but for what reason? His own eyes, not the glory of God. God controls history. He can even overrule the evil or mixed motives of others to bring about his purposes.

We get another important window on the issue of divine sovereignty and human responsibility from the theology of holy war in the Old Testament.³⁶ Again, we bow before a mystery. God's victory is certain; there is no doubt about the outcome of a war when Yahweh enters the battle. The Israelites can just stand back and watch as God overwhelms the enemy. But they do not. They always enter the fray in some way. At Jericho, God commands them to march around the city each day for six days and then on the seventh to march around the city seven times and then blow their trumpets (Josh. 6). This they do. They participate, though there is no doubt as to the outcome or to whom the praise belongs.

God fights for Israel also during the days of Gideon (Judg. 7). He could have defeated the Midianites alone, but he does not do so. Indeed, he commands Gideon to pare down his troops from 32,000 to 300, but the 300 troops still have a job to do.

Goliath was a giant of a soldier, but no match for God. The Lord could have said to Israel, "Stand back so you don't get singed," just before he threw a lightning bolt down from the heavens to reduce the giant to a pile of ash. But that is not the way he did it (1 Sam. 17). Rather, he sends in unarmored and poorly weaponed young David, an inexperienced boy, against a hardened mercenary; but since God is on the side of David, there is again no doubt about the outcome. The head of Goliath is cut off.

Similarly, Daniel 11–12 concerns the various kingdoms that oppress Israel in the fourth and third centuries. Though we do not hear of God's direct involvement in the manner of holy war until the final conflict, we do see his guiding hand in the rise and fall of successive kingdoms (Persia succeeded by Alexander's Greece, succeeded by the Ptolemies and Seleucids). Indeed, the implicit message of this narrative is that, though they all have imperial pretensions, none of them can achieve any lasting or significant empire (in the grand scheme of things) because they keep each other in check. We particularly see this in the seesaw conflict between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids as they wrestle for control of Israel, the "Beautiful Land."

Thus, while we struggle with the harmony between the two themes of divine sovereignty and human responsibility, the Bible clearly teaches that God is sovereign and humans are responsible. We cannot provide a philosophical answer to the conundrum, but they work together. How? We cannot tell. This perspective will leave some dissatisfied. God does not ask for comprehension, but rather for humility before the mystery—the amazing mystery that God can take even sinful human actions and work things out for good.

The wicked and the godly each get their ultimate due. What is the intended effect of the foregoing on the original audience? Towner this time has it right: "The fact that the predicted course has been followed in exquisite detail leads that reader to turn about and face forward with confidence, certain that the future, too, though not yet come to pass, will be as securely in God's hand as world history has been since the seer's time."³⁷

Why confidence? Because, though prospering in the present, the wicked will get their due, and, though suffering in the present, the godly will get their reward. God will see to it.

We have seen these themes from the beginning of the book. Daniel and the three friends, though put through extremely difficult times, were raised higher and higher in glory, while their enemies often were humiliated or even died. We have seen in each of the previous visions of Daniel (chs. 7, 8, 9) that the triumphant wicked end up being destroyed themselves. In chapters 10–12, "events unfold as a pointless sequence of invasions, battles, schemes, and frustrations." Persia falls to Greece (11:3); the great kingdom of Alexander "will be broken up and parceled out toward the four winds of heaven" (11:4). Their successors will fall as well, including Antiochus and the greater evil force that he represents: "Yet he will come to his end, and no one will help him" (11:45).

But that is not enough. Our chapters go further—indeed, further than anywhere else in the Old Testament—in order to address the issue of justice and retribution. The rewards and punishments for faithfulness and rebellion go beyond death itself: "Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt. Those who are wise will shine like the brightness of the heavens, and those who lead many to righteousness, like the stars for ever and ever" (12:2–3).

The wicked will certainly be eternally shamed; "for the wicked to die the same death as the righteous is not enough." Many places in the Old Testament struggle with the issue of divine retribution. After all, the book of Deuteronomy with its covenantal form implies, when isolated from the rest of the canon, that obedience to God will lead to blessings (Deut. 28:1–14), while disobedience will lead to suffering (28:15–68). The book of Proverbs, at least its major theme, celebrates the way of the righteous over the way of the wicked:

The house of the wicked will be destroyed, but the tent of the upright will flourish. (Prov. 14:11) The path of life leads upward for the wise to keep him from going down to the grave. (15:24) Understanding is a fountain of life to those who have it, but folly brings punishment to fools. (16:22)

But experience did not seem to bear this out, at least with the precision of an absolute principle. The Teacher was deeply troubled by real life when he expressed what he observed and gave advice to his listeners based on his experience (Eccl. 7:15–18):

In this meaningless life of mine I have seen both of these: a righteous man perishing in his righteousness, and a wicked many living long in his wickedness.

Do not be overrighteous, neither be overwise—why destroy yourself?

Do not be overwicked, and do not be a fool—
why die before your time?

It is good to grasp the one and not let go of the other.
The man who fears God will avoid all extremes.

But the Teacher was looking only "under the sun." Daniel, thanks to the revelation provided by the celestial beings, gets a view above the sun. If there is going to be any ultimate retribution, it must be "above the sun." Dying is not enough; there must also be eternal shame for people like Antiochus, who persecute God's people. They must be raised from the dead to experience that shame.

Similarly, on the other side, the life of the godly during the period in Daniel's purview is hardly just reward for faithfulness in the midst of persecution. The celestial revelation gives Daniel and his followers the good news: They have something wonderful to look forward to, even after death. As mentioned before, this is the clearest teaching of the afterlife in the Old Testament, but there are certainly indications that lead up to this point.

Genesis 2 describes the first man and woman in the Garden of Eden. The Garden has in its midst two trees, one being the tree of life. The implication seems to be that as long as Adam and Eve are in the Garden they will enjoy life. However, they rebelled against God and were ejected from the Garden, no longer having access to the tree of life. As such, they eventually died. It was with their rebellion against God that death entered the world.

Nonetheless, they did not die immediately, and it was possible for Adam and Eve and their descendants to enjoy a relationship with God. Still, there is little explicit talk about life after death in most of the Old Testament. At best, existence was understood to continue in a shadowy locale called Sheol, which may simply be a reference to the grave. Sheol is not presented in a positive light, nor was fellowship with God thought to continue, as we see in the plea of Psalm 6:5: "No one remembers you [God] when he is dead. Who praises you from the grave?"

Other psalms, however, hint at some kind of continuing existence beyond the grave. Perhaps Psalm 16:9–11 is just talking about healing from a near fatal sickness, but the language is certainly suggestive:

Therefore my heart is glad and my tongue rejoices; my body also will rest secure, because you will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay. You have made known to me the path of life; you will fill me with joy in your presence, with eternal pleasures at your right hand.

In a similar vein are Psalm 49:15 and 73:23–26:

But God will redeem my life from the grave; he will surely take me to himself.

Yet I am always with you; you hold me by my right hand.

You guide me with your counsel, and afterward you will take me into glory.

Whom have I in heaven but you?

And earth has nothing I desire besides you.

My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever.

Other provocative passages may speak of national resurrection, but they use language that provokes thoughts of individual resurrection:

Come, let us return to the LORD.

He has torn us to pieces
but he will heal us;
he has injured us
but he will bind up our wounds.

After two days he will revive us;
on the third day he will restore us, that we may live in his presence. (Hos. 6:1–2)

Then he said to me: "Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel. They say, 'Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off.' Therefore prophesy and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: O my people, I am going to open your graves and bring you up from them; I will bring you back to the land of Israel. Then you, my people, will know that I am the LORD, when I open your graves and bring you up from them. I will put my Spirit in you and you will live, and I will settle you in your own land. Then you will know that I the LORD have spoken, and I have done it, declares the LORD." (Ezek. 37:11–14)

Isaiah 26:19 is as close as we get to the teaching of Daniel 12:2–3 elsewhere in the Old Testament, and like the Hosea and Ezekiel passages just quoted, it too is probably primarily focused on national restoration:⁴²

But your dead will live;
their bodies will rise.
You who dwell in the dust,
wake up and shout for joy.
Your dew is like the dew of the morning;
the earth will give birth to her dead.

Just how new the idea of the resurrection of the dead was to Daniel's original audience is difficult for us to gauge. But we reject the idea that it is a completely foreign idea brought into the Bible via Persian or Hellenistic religious ideas. This is not to deny that perhaps interaction with these and other, earlier foreign ideas about the afterlife affected the formulation and expression of the idea in the Bible, but it is an idea that is also implicit from the very beginning of biblical religion. As we read the Bible as a whole, we see that the idea of an afterlife, like that of other important biblical ideas, has a seed form early, but is more fully developed as God continues to reveal himself to his people.

With that, we turn to a consideration of contemporary significance, where we will see that these ideas are developed even further and take on even greater clarity. Indeed, in many cases we will note that the New Testament authors actually appropriate the language of the book of Daniel in order to show the certainty of the fate of both the wicked and the godly.

Contemporary Significance

WE ARE NOW at the end of the book of Daniel, and we have heard the central theme of the book over and over again: In spite of the present evil situation, God is in control. In a word, God is sovereign. In order to avoid repetitiveness in the commentary, we have not fully developed the theme in each chapter, though the contents of each chapter would justify such a treatment. Rather, we raised the issue in the introduction and provided reminders throughout the commentary. However, now that we have reached the climax of the book and certainly the strongest expression of God's sovereignty not only within the world but even over death, we are justified to spend some time again reflecting on the significance of that theme for our life today. For, you see, God is still sovereign today at the turn to the third millennium A.D., just as he was in the first millennium B.C.

God's sovereignty. That God is sovereign is true in spite of the fact that when we open the morning's newspaper or listen to the news on TV or the radio, we may have a different idea. My wife and I use a radio alarm, and we wake up every morning to a news station in our hometown of Philadelphia. Besides sports scores and weather, we hear the accounts of the latest scandals, wars, and local murders and other crimes. It is easy to be melodramatic and say that the streets of our cities are a war zone, but without resorting to hyperbole it is still obvious that social and moral chaos is evident all over the world. It is tempting to believe that when we step out into that world every morning, we are prey to incredible risk. Who knows whether, when we step out of our homes (or even before) in the morning, "our time is up" and we will find ourselves the victim of crime, disease, or accident?

The potential for harm is huge when we look at the statistics. Just last week two incidents illustrated this to me on a personal level. As I was driving my son back from school on a nice sunny day, we came to an intersection where our progress was blocked by police activity. As we sat there, a police officer pulled his gun as he walked in front of our car and set off in hot pursuit of a criminal. I did not stay around long enough to see if shots were fired, but the potential was there. In a second incident, a young university student downtown was not as fortunate. As he sat in his classroom painting a picture, a drive-by shooting occurred. Besides killing the intended victim, a stray shot went through the window of the classroom, seriously wounding the young student.

How easy it is to wander into the middle of a situation and end up dead or wounded. On one level, there is really nothing we can do to protect ourselves from these risks. We can work out, be incredibly well informed, be cautious, and still be struck down in some form. This was the conclusion of the Teacher (Eccl. 9:11–12):

The race is not to the swift or the battle to the strong, nor does food come to the wise or wealth to the brilliant or favor to the learned;
but time and chance happen to them all.
Moreover, no man knows when his hour will come:
As fish are caught in a cruel net, or birds are taken in a snare, so men are trapped by evil times that fall unexpectedly upon them.

This was the Teacher's "under the sun" perspective. We are like fish caught in a net, prey to time and chance.⁴³

In Daniel 11 we get an "above the sun" perspective on life. There we see God's hand guiding the events of history. In the words of Daniel's earlier prayer, "he sets up kings and deposes them" (2:21). The Persians fall to Alexander, and Alexander gives way to the Seleucids and the Ptolemies. God finally brings all this human pretension to an end, but even before this climactic moment we see his sovereignty at work in the affairs of human beings.

The good news is that God is no less in control today than he was in antiquity. To hear some modern Christian leaders talk, we might not believe this is the case. With a note of panic in their voice, they tell us that things have gotten out of control in the seat of our government. If we do not act immediately (often by sending in a check), our whole society will be turned over to the devil!

I am not prepared to defend the moral quality of our government, nor (as will become obvious below) do I want to argue to "let go and let God." God does expect us to work for righteousness' sake. What I object to is the shrill note, the panicky mood, the sense of loss of control. God is in control.

And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified. (Rom. 8:28–30)

We see in the New Testament what we saw in the Old in the case of Joseph, Samson, Daniel, and the holy war tradition. While it looks as if life is going to hell, God is working behind the scenes to bring about good, often more than good—he accomplishes his people's rescue, their salvation.

Think of the death of Jesus Christ in the light of Peter's sermon recorded in Acts 2:22–24:

Men of Israel, listen to this: Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him, as you yourselves know. This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross. But God raised him from the dead, freeing him from the agony of death, because it was impossible for death to keep its hold on him.

God was in control even as the soldiers were nailing his hands and feet to the cross. The soldiers were nonetheless responsible—they were "wicked"—even though their actions fit into the overarching plan of God.

How does this have contemporary significance for us? In many ways. First of all, it is this act that provides our salvation. It is the death of Jesus that substitutes for our death, and his resurrection that anticipates our own (see below).

But it is also relevant because it provides the theological background to the Romans 8:28–30 passage cited above. God works out everything, including acts of harm against us, for our good. As we continue reading that passage, we see the effect this truth should have on us today (8:31–39):

What, then, shall we say in response to this? If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things? Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies. Who is he that condemns? Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? As it is written:

"For your sake we face death all day long;

we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered."

No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

God is in control in spite of present circumstances. In sixth-century Babylon it looked to the godly as if Babylon and then Persia were in control. But they weren't. In second-century Palestine it looked as if Antiochus Epiphanes was in control, but he wasn't. In the first century of Jesus and Paul, it looked as if Rome was in control, but it wasn't. To Christians living two thousand years after Jesus, it may look as if Satan is in control, but he isn't. God is in control, and because of that we can have boundless joy and optimism in the midst of our struggles.

And we do have struggles. Those struggles may be political or cultural. They may be emotional or psychological. They may be relational. But whatever the struggle, whatever the oppression, God is in control, and in spite of present appearances he will bring victory over evil and honor to those who remain faithful to him. The book of Daniel is a call to all God's people to remain steadfast in their love and obedience to him in spite of present turmoil.

Objections to God's sovereignty. What a wonderful message! Why do so many today recoil from it? One reason may be that deep inside of ourselves we would prefer to think of ourselves as free, even if our freedom meant despair. To many control implies servitude and dependency, and the spirit of our age desires autonomy, even at a cost.

Two worldviews are prevalent in secular culture today, modernism and postmodernism,⁴⁴ the latter presently in the process of displacing the former. Both have at their heart an impulse toward autonomy and a desire to avoid ultimate dependency on a higher power.

The spirit of modernism was captured by the Enlightenment, an intellectual movement originating from the Renaissance and perhaps best exemplified by its starting point, the philosopher Descartes (1596–1650), who proclaimed as the foundation to his theory of knowledge cogito ergo sum ("I think, therefore I am"). Existence has its foundation not in God, but in the autonomous self. Indeed, the Enlightenment may be understood as a reaction against the dogmatism of the medieval church. Modern men and women do not accept anything because of tradition or because of authority, especially church authority, but because reason proves it. Science may perhaps be possible only because of a Christian worldview, but the scientific method is often wielded in a spirit of autonomous reason. Modernism and science are an extremely optimistic approach to life, in their faith in the human mind to improve the world and to discover their world.

But that optimism has been seriously eroded since the late nineteenth century by a spirit of suspicion that detects beneath an indefatigable confidence in reason as the avenue to truth, a manipulative will-to-power and self-interest. Postmodernism casts doubt on human ability to come into direct contact with reality as well as on our pretensions to determine meaning. The modern chapter of such skepticism begins with nineteenth-century philosophers Feuerbach and Nietzsche. Their primary struggle was still against the dogmatism of Christian theology, but they also undermined any hope that one can approach reality in an unprejudiced manner and achieve truth. In perhaps one of his most famous sayings, Nietzsche wrote in his Notebooks (1873): "What is truth? A mobile army of metaphors, metonymns and anthropomorphisms." As A. C. Thiselton goes on to comment and further quote Nietzsche:

Especially in religion, Nietzsche urges, people use "errors" for their own advantage, self-interest or power. Some promote erroneous "lies" merely from sheer personal need. In this sense, Nietzsche exclaims: "Truth is that kind of error without which a certain species of living cannot exist. The value of Life is ultimately decisive." Nietzsche goes further. He includes even "facts" here. He writes: "All that exists consists of interpretations." "Truths are illusions we have forgotten are illusions."

While Nietzsche's comments here are directed specifically toward the global truth statements of theology and philosophy, they are equally relevant toward the modern spirit of science. Increasingly, scientists recognize that what they provide are not absolutely true statements about reality, but models and metaphors that explain phenomena.

It is Nietzsche's skepticism that dominates philosophy departments today in the form of postmodernism or deconstruction. A leading motif of this thought is, in the language of Nietzsche, the death of God, and in the language of Jacques Derrida, his most famous modern disciple, the denial of the Absolute Signifier. In its place stand autonomous men and women. Nietzsche hated what he called the "slave morality" of Christianity: Christians believe in an all-controlling God before whom human beings should submit even in the light of their suffering; he felt that this picture, a picture of life that we get in Daniel 11, was despicable and diminished humanity. It kept human beings in their place. Just like the caste system in India, which has served to keep the upper classes as the oppressors and the untouchables and other lower classes as the menial servants, so Christianity and biblical religion have kept humans docile in their suffering and pain.

These perspectives of postmodernism have been exacerbated by the hope for the afterlife. What better way to keep servile people down in this life than to tell them that there is a better life coming as long as they are obedient in the present? Of course, this fueled much of the criticism of Karl Marx, an older contemporary of Nietzsche, who felt that biblical religion was an "opiate" of the people. In a more popular vein, this jaundiced attitude is expressed by the commonly heard sarcastic remark directed toward Christianity, which they see as promoting a "pie in the sky by-and-by," and the jibe that Christians are so "heavenly-minded that they are no earthly good."

Descartes, Feuerbach, Nietzsche, Marx, and Derrida are just notable representatives of the thinkers who represent the currents of the worldviews known as modernism and postmodernism. How convenient it would be to say that they are just an elite with which we need have little to do. However, whether they merely express the spirit of an age or influence an age—or a combination of the two—the important point is that they articulate what drives many men and women living today. It is really unimportant how the dynamic works. It could be that these thinkers influence modern university teachers and other leaders, who then influence journalists, screen writers, musicians, ministers, and others, who in turn mediate these ideas to the mass populace. Or perhaps the thinkers are expressing their own experiences and wisdom based on their experiences along with everyone else.

Indeed, one guess why postmodernism with its denial of even the possibility of absolute truth has so captured the modern imagination is because we no longer live in an isolated society. A century ago it was much easier for a nonmobile population with unsophisticated means of communication to live in the blissful illusion that their way of life was the best one. Now we have air travel, radios, television, movies, the Internet. In America and many other places in the world we have a mixing of ethnic groups with their different beliefs and worldviews on an unprecedented scale. And in a secular democracy like ours it is wrong simply to privilege one of those worldviews above the others. Postmodernism's lack of confidence in the truth, stemming from a denial of deity, may represent a hesitation in the light of a global community.

At its heart, however, is a revulsion of the kind of claim that Daniel 11– 12 makes about a sovereign God. In the interests of an autonomous self, God must be rejected. In the summer of 1998 one of the most popular movies was called The Truman Show, starring Jim Carey. On one level, this movie was an ironic critique of our media-saturated culture, but it actually went much deeper and illustrated the fact that the philosopher's message is in accord with the thinking of the wider population. The main character in the movie was Truman. Without his knowledge, he was born and lived his entire life in a huge television studio. For over thirty years, he did not know that everyone he came into contact with—his father, mother, wife, friends, and even the people walking their dogs down his street—were paid actors, nor did he know that he was the subject of a television show that played twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. There were five thousand cameras in the studio, in the buttons of the actors, in street lights, in his desk at work. The weather and even the rising sun were controlled by computers. He was the center of a huge soap opera, and what caught the attention of the audience was the fact that he did not know it.

Finally, through a series of miscues, he began to realize the "truth," that he was living an illusion. His life was controlled not by his decisions, but by a director, Christophe. Once he discovered that his life was scripted, he wanted nothing more than to escape. Even though his life was good and there were uncertainties and dangers on the outside, he wanted to gain his independence and throw off the shackles of the director. His fight to achieve that independence and escape the "set" brought the dramatic tension to the story.

At the very end, when Truman had won all our affection and we all desired his escape from this benevolent control, the deeper theological intentions of the movie came out. The director, speaking from his control tower, which was in the manufactured sky (heavens) of the set, spoke with a microphone to the exhausted Truman, who had just battled his way to the edge of the set, appealing to him to stay under his control. But in an assertion of modern/postmodern autonomy and to the approval of all of us in the audience, he rejected this control and left the set.

Even though we all can applaud Truman's rejection of a human authority that was ultimately self-interested and manipulative, the movie intended for us also to desire complete autonomy even from God. The implicit message of the movie and the explicit urgings of philosophers like Nietzsche is that God's control diminishes, not enhances, our humanity.

Here is where the critique is wrong. It is wrong because the sovereignty of God does not make us puppets on a string (see Bridging Contexts section). It does not render our actions meaningless, as they did Truman's. They are a word of comfort and hope in the midst of despair and pain. Daniel 11–12 reminds us that it is not divine sovereignty that leads to oppression, but rather human autonomy. It is the king who "will do as he pleases," who "will exalt and magnify himself above every god and say unheard-of things against the God of gods" (11:36), whom we have to fear and not God.

Even so, we as Christians must be sensitive and careful. Why was there such a strong reaction against Christianity? Why did the Enlightenment throw off the shackles of church dogma? Why did Nietzsche feel that Christianity diminished humanity, when the Bible tells us the opposite? Why do people today recoil at evangelicals in the public square? Oh, how easy it is to ascribe this only to the perversity of autonomous people. But we must be honest and acknowledge that the truth has been used to manipulate, condemn, repress, restrict, and oppress others in illegitimate ways. And we do not have to go back to theological arguments of the past that led to Jewish pogroms, to people who tried to resist civil rights, or to the support of apartheid in the name of the faith. Christianity is being used in the present to promote nonbiblical models of the family, the relationship of the sexes, destructive attitudes toward people of "alternative lifestyles," and so forth.

We are so worried that our country or society will end up in social or moral chaos that the church sometimes speaks with a panicky voice and tries to impose a coercive lifestyle on those with whom we differ. We need to remind ourselves that God is in control. We can certainly voice our differences and disapproval, but we must do so with love in our voice and with open arms to embrace the other person. We can do this, even though it involves tremendous risk, because God is in control. The risk is that our society might, in one sense, go to hell and be a dangerous place to live, but in another sense, there is no risk because God is in control and there is more to life than the present.

Again, God's sovereignty and ultimate control is good, not evil like the director in the movie The Truman Show. Postmodern society shows the effects of postmodern philosophy. The tenor of the former is captured by Proverbs 29:18: "When people do not accept divine guidance, they run wild. But whoever obeys the law is happy" (NLT). We should rejoice in God's sovereignty, for not only is it still true that God is in control, but it is clearer to us than to Daniel's contemporaries that there is something beyond this life. It is to that subject that we will turn in closing.

The ultimate resolution. We do not need to argue a lot to convince people that life is essentially unfair. True, the wicked sometimes end up having their schemes blow up in their faces. Certainly there are some good, godly people who get the praise they deserve. But for the most part that is not the case. The wicked sometimes flourish and the godly often suffer. If this life were everything, it would be true to say that it is unfair, and, if one believes in God, it would be fair to say that God is unfair. The problem of retribution is a huge one in the Bible, particularly the Old Testament. We need only think of the books of Job and Ecclesiastes to remember how the Old Testament saints struggled with this issue.

Daniel 12, however, makes it clear that the wicked will ultimately get what they deserve—destruction and shame—while the godly will get what they deserve—honor and life. These themes are much more fully developed in the New Testament and are the basis of Christian hope in the midst of a difficult present.

In the Gospels we see Jesus Christ, God himself, subjecting himself to the suffering of the world, even enduring death. But Christ did not just die; he rose again. In 1 Corinthians 15 Paul develops the idea that Christ's death and resurrection formed a pattern we will follow. Christ suffered so that we might have hope for the future.

Death has been swallowed up in victory.

"Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" (1 Cor. 15:55)

Death is not the end of the story, according to the New Testament.

The themes of Daniel are developed nowhere more fully than in the book of Revelation. It has long been noted that Daniel informs much of the thinking and imagery of that book. It is therefore not surprising that it is here that we learn most fully about the end of history and the ultimate destiny of humanity and of each and every individual.

One link may be seen in the description of the glorified Christ that stands toward the beginning of the book. Note how it reminds us of the figure dressed in linen in Daniel's final vision (Rev. 1:12–16):

I turned around to see the voice that was speaking to me. And when I turned I saw seven golden lampstands, and among the lampstands was someone "like the son of man," dressed in a robe reaching down to his feet and with a golden sash around his chest. His head and hair were white like wool, as white as snow, and his eyes were like blazing fire. His feet were like bronze flowing in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of rushing waters. In his right hand he held seven stars, and out of his mouth came a sharp double-edged sword. His face was like the sun shining in all its brilliance.

Other descriptions of Christ in the book of Revelation also reflect not only Daniel 10–12, but also Daniel 7 and the figure of the "one like a son of man."

In Revelation we learn more about the final war with Michael at the head of the angelic warriors (Rev. 12:7). After all, the seals are being opened (5:1–4). Even some of the time sequences seem closely related to the time indicators of the book of Daniel (13:5).

Revelation gives us the picture of the end, when God's victory in Christ is secure. The victory was won on the cross, but we await the Second Coming for its ultimate resolution. When that occurs, the final judgment will take place. Everyone will rise from the dead—some to eternal shame (Rev. 20:11–15) and some to the glories of the New Jerusalem (chs. 21–22).

This is the hope with which the book of Daniel ends and which, developed further, the Bible as a whole concludes; it is a future, an eschatological hope. How is this not "pie in the sky by-and-by"? Well, in one sense it is. We have allowed the ridicule of the world to diminish our eschatological hope, and we should not because the Bible does give us hope based on future realities. But this hope is not tenuous, based on wish fulfillment; it is based on faith: "Now faith is being sure of what we hope for and certain of what we do not see" (Heb. 11:1). In other words, it is based on past realities as we have already seen in 1 Corinthians 15, the death and resurrection of Christ.

Our faith in the past event of the cross gives us a certain hope for our future, which in turn gives us confidence in the midst of a troubled present. Though we suffer now, we also can live life to its fullest. In spite of difficulty, we know that something better is coming in the future and so we can enjoy the present. The message of the books of Daniel and Revelation is not to just wait for the future; rather, in the angelic words to Daniel, it is to "go your way till the end. You will rest, and then at the end of the days you will rise to receive your allotted inheritance" (Dan. 12:13).

Scripture Index

Genesis

Ge 1:11-12; 183 Ge 1:21, 24, 25; 183 Ge 1:27; 152, 186 Ge 2–3; 241 Ge 2; 294 Ge 2:14; 247 Ge 3; 196, 256 Ge 3:14–15; 256 Ge 11; 127 Ge 11:1-9; 142 Ge 12:1–3; 168, 237 Ge 12:2–3; 59 Ge 15:1; 249 Ge 15:18; 247 Ge 26:24; 247 Ge 28:10–22; 77 Ge 39; 58 Ge 41; 73 Ge 44:5; 55 Ge 50:20–21; 291 Ge 50:20; 169

Exodus

Ex 8:19; 138
Ex 13:21; 187
Ex 15; 254
Ex 19:16; 187
Ex 20:2; 232
Ex 20:3–6; 104
Ex 27:19; 46
Ex 29:39–41; 203
Ex 30:27; 46
Ex 31:8; 46
Ex 31:18; 138

Leviticus

Le 11; 52 Le 16:2; 187 Le 25:1–7; 222 Le 26:31–33, 43; 222

Numbers

Nu 5:11–31; 163 Nu 6:1–4; 52 Nu 28:3–8; 203

Deuteronomy

book; 219, 220, 223, 239 De 1:1-5; 231 De 1:7; 247 De 1:9–3:27; 232 De 4:1–26:19; 232 De 4:19; 251 De 4:20; 102 De 5:6; 232 De 11–12; 292 De 12:23–26; 52 De 18:14; 55, 77 De 22:9–11; 183 De 27–28; 224, 232 De 28:1–14; 219, 293 De 28:15–68; 293 De 28:64–68; 60, 219, 233 De 28:64; 232 De 30:1–10; 233 De 30:19–20; 233 De 32:8–9; 250 De 32:39; 102

Joshua

Jos 1:4; 247 Jos 5:13–15; 254 Jos 6; 254, 291

Judges

Jdg 5; 254 Jdg 5:20; 284 Jdg 6:23; 249 Jdg 7; 291 Jdg 16:28; 291

1 Samuel

1Sa 2:1; 189 1Sa 4–5; 47, 146, 255 1Sa 13; 141 1Sa 15; 141 1Sa 17; 292 1Sa 20:30–34; 52 1Sa 23:1–6; 254

2 Samuel

2Sa 9:9–13; 52 2Sa 11; 241 2Sa 12; 141 2Sa 14:25; 49 2Sa 19:27–29; 52

1 Kings

1Ki 3:5; 77 1Ki 8; 219 1Ki 8:33–34; 220 1Ki 8:35–36; 161 1Ki 8:46–51; 220, 233 1Ki 15:15; 46 1Ki 18; 141

2 Kings

2Ki 14:14; 46 2Ki 20:19; 81 2Ki 24:1–4; 43 2Ki 24:1; 43

```
2Ki 24:13; 47
2Ki 25:13–17; 47
```

2 Chronicles

2Ch 4:16; 46 2Ch 36:4–8; 45 2Ch 36:6–7; 43 2Ch 36:20–22; 222

Ezra

Ezr 1-2; 246 Ezr 1:1-4; 143 Ezr 1:9-11; 47 Ezr 2:62; 52 Ezr 4:5-7; 273 Ezr 7-10; 144 Ezr 9:6-15; 223

Nehemiah

Ne 1-7; 144 Ne 1:5-11; 223 Ne 7:64; 52 Ne 9:5; 79 Ne 9:6-37; 223 Ne 11-13; 144

Esther

book; 136 Es 1:13; 79 Es 1:19; 160 Es 8:8; 160

Job

book; 87, 150, 239 Job 7:12; 182 Job 12:13; 79 Job 38:7; 284

Psalms

- Ps 2; 27
- Ps 6:3; 204
- Ps 6:5; 294
- Ps 8:3; 138
- Ps 13:1–2; 204
- Ps 16:9–11; 204
- Ps 18:14–15; 256
- Ps 18:15; 182
- Ps 19:7–11; 167
- Ps 24; 154, 254
- Ps 24:1–2; 256
- Ps 29:10; 256
- Ps 30; 129
- Ps 30:6–7; 129
- Ps 35:17; 204
- Ps 41:14; 79
- Ps 49:15; 295
- Ps 51; 241
- Ps 51:1-4; 241
- Ps 55:17; 161
- Ps 68:4; 187
- Ps 69:24–25, 27; 263
- Ps 73; 126, 289
- Ps 73:3–12; 124
- Ps 73:23–26; 295
- Ps 74:12–17; 256
- Ps 75:5; 189
- Ps 78; 28
- Ps 78:1–8; 29
- Ps 89:17, 24; 189
- Ps 98; 254
- Ps 104:3-4; 187
- Ps 106:48; 79
- Ps 112:9; 189
- Ps 113:2; 79
- Ps 118:22; 92, 93
- Ps 127:1; 128
- Ps 145:13; 118

Proverbs

book; 85, 89, 90 Pr 1–9; 85 Pr 1:7; 86 Pr 1:8–9; 85 Pr 1:20–33; 86 Pr 10–31; 85 Pr 12:11; 85 Pr 14:11; 293 Pr 15:23; 92 Pr 15:24; 293 Pr 26:7, 9; 92 Pr 28:10; 169 Pr 29:18; 304

Ecclesiastes

book; 86, 87, 239 Ec 5:2; 289 Ec 7:15–18; 293 Ec 8:9–10; 127 Ec 8:10; 289 Ec 9:11–12; 297 Ec 12:8; 86 Ec 12:13–14; 86

Song of Songs

So 4:4; 49

Isaiah

Is 6:7; 252 Is 7; 27 Is 14:12–14; 282 Is 19:1; 187 Is 26:19; 284, 296 Is 27:1; 182, 256 Is 39:7; 48 Is 40–48; 75

```
Is 40:3–5; 225
Is 44:12–20; 105
Is 44:28; 137
Is 45:1; 137
Is 46:6–7; 75
Is 46:9–10; 75
Is 47; 55
Is 47:13–14; 75
Is 59:3; 52
```

Jeremiah

book; 218, 219, 220 Je 3:19; 277 Je 5:22; 182 Je 7; 161 Je 12; 180 Je 31; 237 Je 31:31–34; 236 Je 31:31–33; 236 Je 32:9–12; 285 Je 36; 141 Je 46:2; 45 Je 51:27–29; 185 Je 52:17–23; 47

Lamentations

book; 161 La 2:4–5; 255

Ezekiel

Eze 1; 247, 248
Eze 1:1; 202
Eze 1:7; 248
Eze 1:13; 248
Eze 1:16; 248
Eze 1:24; 248
Eze 1:27; 247
Eze 9–11; 161

```
Eze 9:2; 247
Eze 17:1–10; 119
Eze 20:6, 15; 203
Eze 24:21-23; 251
Eze 28:1–19; 283
Eze 31:3–14; 119
Eze 34; 202
Eze 37:11–14; 295
```

Daniel

```
Da 1-6; 19, 42, 58, 176, 178
Da 1; 74, 89, 90, 100, 107, 133, 143, 146, 164, 167
Da 1:1-3; 21
Da 1:1-2; 123, 231
Da 1:2; 133, 202
Da 1:5; 76
Da 1:21; 21
Da 2-7; 19, 116
Da 2–6; 176
Da 2; 19, 20, 56, 96, 102, 123, 133, 140, 147, 164, 176, 183, 185
Da 2:11; 100
Da 2:21; 298
Da 2:22; 54
Da 2:49; 99
Da 3; 19, 55, 83, 87, 97, 123, 133, 134, 147, 148, 159, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167, 171
Da 3:16–18; 19
Da 3:17–18; 167
Da 3:31; 116
Da 4; 19, 56, 133, 134, 140, 145, 147, 148, 164, 185
Da 4:8; 50
Da 4:9; 140
Da 4:13; 188
Da 4:20; 102
Da 5; 19, 21, 47, 56, 117, 164, 179
Da 5:14; 116
Da 6; 19, 55, 97, 133, 221
Da 6:10; 28
Da 7–12; 19, 22, 177, 229
Da 7–8; 245
```

```
Da 7; 19, 81, 88, 178, 179, 180, 185, 210, 255, 289, 292, 305
Da 7:1–2; 22
Da 7:1; 180
Da 7:8; 283
Da 7:11; 283
Da 7:13; 252
Da 7:25; 210, 283, 286, 287
Da 8–12; 178
Da 8; 81, 88, 176, 178, 179, 189, 192, 255, 292
Da 8:1–4; 137
Da 8:9–12; 283
Da 8:9; 277
Da 8:13; 188
Da 8:14; 287
Da 8:15–20; 137
Da 8:25; 255
Da 9; 46, 178, 193, 210, 245, 292
Da 9:1; 253
Da 9:20-27; 256
Da 9:25-27; 210
Da 9:27; 207, 256
Da 10–12; 88, 198
Da 10; 179, 188, 194, 210, 230
Da 10:1; 21, 56
Da 10:3; 53
Da 11; 22, 97, 179, 210
Da 12; 112, 177, 179, 180, 210
Da 12:1-3; 108
Da 12:4; 180, 205
Da 12:5–13; 180
Da 12:7; 190
Da 12:9; 211
Da 12:11; 190
Da 12:12; 190
```

Hosea

Ho 2:14–15; 225 Ho 6:1–2; 295 Ho 9:3; 52

Amos

Am 7:17; 52 Am 8:12; 285

Nahum

book; 254 Na 1:3; 187 Na 1:4; 182, 256

Habakkuk

Hab 3:15; 182

Zechariah

Zec 1:12; 222 Zec 14:20–21; 152

Malachi

Mal 1:7, 12; 52

Matthew

Mt 2:1–12; 55 Mt 3:11-12; 257 Mt 5:17–20; 25, 239 Mt 7:1–2; 149 Mt 7:5; 151, 262 Mt 10:16; 67, 69 Mt 10:28; 111 Mt 11:1-19; 282 Mt 11:3; 257 Mt 23:35; 108 Mt 26:26–30; 235 Mt 26:52-54; 258 Mt 27:11–14; 111 Mt 27:11; 172 Mt 27:51; 152 Mt 28:19–20; 261

Mark

Mk 1:15; 240 Mk 13; 214, 282 Mk 13:26; 198 Mk 13:32; 212 Mk 13:33–36; 214

Luke

Lu 1:13; 249 Lu 1:19, 26; 205 Lu 6:27; 79 Lu 16:19–31; 153 Lu 16:29–31; 153 Lu 20:18; 93 Lu 22:20; 236 Lu 24:25–27; 26, 61, 125, 165 Lu 24:44–45; 27, 61, 125 Lu 24:44; 165

John

Jn 8:26; 149 Jn 9:2; 150 Jn 12:31; 149 Jn 17:14; 67 Jn 17:16; 67 Jn 17:18; 67 Jn 17:21; 67

Acts

Ac 2:22–24; 173, 298 Ac 5; 169 Ac 5:29; 111, 169 Ac 9; 248 Ac 10; 61 Ac 14:8–20; 83 Ac 15; 61 Ac 22:3–5; 87 Ac 24–26; 111

Romans

Ro 1:21–22; 106 Ro 2:1–4; 149 Ro 3:10–18; 195 Ro 7:21–24; 262 Ro 8:18–27; 126 Ro 8:18; 266 Ro 8:28–30; 298, 299 Ro 8:31–39; 299 Ro 11:33; 150 Ro 13:1–7; 65 Ro 15:4; 124

1 Corinthians

1Co 1:18–2:16; 87 1Co 1:20; 87 1Co 1:29; 129 1Co 1:30; 88 1Co 3:16; 152 1Co 8; 61 1Co 10:6; 29, 59, 124 1Co 15; 304, 305 1Co 15:20; 173 1Co 15:54–56; 173 1Co 15:55; 304

2 Corinthians

2Co 7:10; 240 2Co 10:17; 129

Galatians

Ga 1:4; 191 Ga 3:10–11; 238

Ephesians

Eph 4:7–8; 258 Eph 4:22; 262

```
Eph 6; 259, 264
Eph 6:10–18; 258
Eph 6:12; 197
```

Philippians

Php 2:6–11; 125 Php 2:12; 290 Php 3:20; 67

Colossians

Col 1:15; 111 Col 2:3; 88, 90 Col 2:12; 262 Col 2:14–15; 198 Col 2:15; 258 Col 3:9; 198

1 Thessalonians

1Th 5:2; 215

2 Timothy

2Ti 2:5; 237 2Ti 3:14–16; 235 2Ti 4:8; 149

Titus

Tit 3:3; 68

Hebrews

Heb 1:1–4; 234 Heb 10:12–14; 240 Heb 11:4–40; 29 Heb 11:33–34; 169 Heb 12:2; 130 Heb 12:11–12; 130

James

```
Jam 1:22–25; 238
Jam 2:8–11; 150
Jam 3:9; 152
Jam 5:10–11, 16–18; 29
```

1 Peter

1Pe 1:10–12; 26, 280

1 John

1Jn 2:18; 282

Jude

Jud 8; 251

Revelation

```
book; 128, 177, 213, 264
Rev 1:7; 198
Rev 1:12–16; 305
Rev 1:15; 248
Rev 1:17; 249
Rev 7:17; 212
Rev 12:7; 251
Rev 12:9; 196
Rev 13; 198
Rev 17:14; 128
Rev 20; 193, 210
Rev 20:11–15; 305
Rev 21–22; 305
Rev 21:4; 212
```

Subject Index

A | B | C | D | E | F | G | H | I | J | L | M | N | O | P | Q | R | S | T | W

A

```
abomination of desolation, 207, 256, 279, 286
    afterlife, 108, 128, 179, 201, 210, 230, 253, 284, 289, 294–96, 301, 304–6
    Akkadian, 49
    Ancient of Days, 186, 188
    angel, 102–3, 188, 205–6, 226, 247–53, 273, 284–87 animal imagery, 121, 183–86, 188, 194, 196, 201, 203, 206
    Antichrist, 190, 214–15, 272, 281–84
    Antiochus Epiphanes, 190, 197, 206–7, 209–10, 226–27, 229, 271–74, 281–84, 286, 290, 199
    apocalyptic, 176–77, 180, 190–92, 205, 207, 210, 215, 222, 225–29, 253, 287
    Aramaic, 49, 101, 116, 119, 139, 160, 177, 202
    astrology, see divination
B
    Baal, 187
    Babylon, 121, 123, 284
    Babylonian Chronicle, 136
    blasphemy, 137, 145–46, 151–52
\mathbf{C}
    Christ, 26–27, 61, 67, 87–88, 90–93, 111–12, 125, 227, 266, 282, 299 chronology, 42–45, 56, 75–76, 96, 134, 157, 190, 192–93, 201–2, 205, 207–8, 210–15, 222, 246, 253, 287–88
    church/state, 170
    comfort, 126, 179, 198, 245–46, 249, 292, 303 confidence, 122 control, see God, sovereignty of covenant, 52, 219, 223, 230–39
    creation, 183
    culture and Christianity, 61–69, 107–8
```

```
Daniel, the book of, date, 21–24, 117
    Darius the Mede, 135, 157–58, 246, 253 death, 107–12, 116, 127 demons, see Satan deliverance, 178, 201, 208-9, 225, 229 dietary laws, 52
    discipleship, 167
    dispensations, 83
    diviners, divination, 50, 77–78, 87, 99, 116, 183 dreams, 74, 77–78, 80, 88–89, 116, 119–20, 133 dynastic prophecy, 271
E
    Enuma Elish, 181
    envy, 166
    Esther, 58
    ethics, 27–29, 57–58
    eunuch, 51
    evil, 178, 194, 201, 208, 229, 253, 288
F folly, 85–86
G
    Gabriel, 205-6, 226, 228, 234, 250 genre, 57–60, 74, 97, 117, 133, 143–44, 158, 176–77, 180, 271–72
    God, as cloud rider, 187; as king, 82, 89, 92, 103; sovereignty of, 20, 45, 56, 62, 73, 75, 79, 82, 88–89, 97, 116, 118, 122–28, 134, 142, 147–48, 164–65, 172–73, 177, 179, 193, 202, 207–8, 229, 246, 252–53, 288–92, 296–306; as warrior, 179, 189, 194, 204, 209, 247, 250–51, 253–
      66, 284, 288, 291–92
\mathbf{H}
    hermeneutics, continuity/discontinuity with the NT, 24–25, 29, 124, 236–39 history, 59, 144
    horn imagery, 189, 203-4, 206
I
    idols, 52, 62, 75, 97–101, 103–12, 134, 137, 146–47
```

```
imagery, 178, 192
J
    Joseph, 58, 73-74, 168, 172, 290 judgment, 143, 149–50, 169, 179, 201, 209, 253, 289, 292–96, 304–6
L law, 166-67, 169-70, 236, 239-40
M
    Michael, 251, 284-85
    mystery, 78, 80
N names, 50–51
    narrator, 144-45
    number imagery, 190, 193, 210, 215, 222, 227-28 0 ordeal, 163 outline, 30–31
P persecution, 126
    postmodernism, 110-11, 153-54, 302
    prayer, 78, 85, 91–92, 161, 164–65, 167, 170, 178, 220, 223, 225–26, 228–29, 240–41, 246–47
    Prayer of Nabonidus, 117 pride, 47, 116, 121-30, 122-30, 134, 145, 189, 209 proverb, 92
Q
    Qumran, 117, 188
R redemption, 168 relationships, 109, 240-43
```

```
repentance, 134, 147-48, 150, 178, 201, 209, 229-30, 239-43, 253 responsibility, human, 147-48, 288 revelation, 90, 150, 180
S
    Satan and demons, 128, 256, 259, 262, 265–66 schools, 67
    sea, 180-82, 184, 257
    self, 110–11
    Septuagint, 96
    shame, 129-30
    sin, 195–97, 219, 225, 240–43, 262
    Son of Man, 186, 188, 198, 255
    story, 58–59, 96, 101, 105, 144
\mathbf{T} temple articles, 46–47, 133, 137–38, 141, 145, 147, 151, 153 tree, 119
W
    wisdom, 54-55, 58, 73-74, 78-79, 85-93, 101, 116, 139, 144, 242, 284
    Word of God, 148, 153, 221, 228, 234–35, 237
```

Notes

- 1. Other features of the book, beyond the theme of divine sovereignty, unite the two halves of Daniel. These include the obvious similarities between Daniel 2 and 7. Even closer study indicates a chiastic arrangement between chapters 2–7, which J. G. Baldwin, "Theology of Daniel," NIDOTTE, 4:499, outlines as follows:
 - A. Four empires and God's coming kingdom (ch. 2)
 - B. Trial by fire and God's deliverance (ch. 3)
 - C. A king warned, chastised, and delivered (ch. 4)
 - C'. A king warned, defiant, and deposed (ch. 5)
 - B'. Trial in the lions' den and God's deliverance (ch. 6)
 - A'. Four empires and God's everlasting kingdom (ch. 7)

Furthermore, the book as we have it is written in Aramaic and Hebrew, and the distribution of the two languages overlaps the distinct genres (with Aramaic in 2:4b-7:28, Hebrew in 1:1-2:4a and 8:1-12:13).

- 2. For a further explication of this point and an extended discussion of the warrior image, see T. Longman III and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995).
- 3. This describes the general argument of a perceptive commentator like J. Goldingay, Daniel (Waco, Tex.: Word, 1989).
- 4. See my study of ancient Near Eastern pseudonymity with an emphasis on royal autobiography; T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1991).
- 5. W. S. Towner, Daniel (Atlanta: John Knox, 1984).
- 6. On the other hand, there are other interpreters who do not feel a need to struggle with this issue because they do not believe the Bible is divine revelation by any definition of the term.
- 7. Baldwin has also strongly and clearly advocated a sixth-century date in her commentary (Daniel, TOTC [Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1978).
- 8. J. Baldwin, "Theology of Daniel," NIDOTTE, 4:499.
- 9. For an excellent treatment of this issue, see B. Waltke, "Theonomy in Relation to Dispensational and Covenant Theologies," in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, ed. by W. Barker and R. Godfrey (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), 59–87, and T. Longman III, "God's Law and Mosaic Punishments Today" (pp. 41–57 in the same volume).
- 10. My book Reading the Bible with Heart and Mind (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1997) is an attempt to deal with this issue with the major genres of the Bible (history, law, wisdom, poetry, prophecy, gospel, epistle, and apocalyptic).
- 11. E. P. Clowney, Preaching and Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961), develops this idea fully.
- 12. Following the warning given by J. H. Walton, L. D. Bailey, and C. Williford, "Bible-Based Curricula and the Crisis of Scriptural Authority," Christian Education Journal 13 (1993): 83–94.
- 13. S. Greidanus, Sola Scriptura: Problems and Principles in Preaching Historical Texts (Kampen: J. H. Kok, 1970) narrates a debate among Dutch interpreters and preachers that drove a wedge between moralistic preaching and "redemptive-historical" preaching. The issues and debate are instructive, but the conclusion we should reach is that it is a both/and solution, not an either/or.
- 14. As argued in T. Longman III, Literary Approaches to Biblical Interpretation (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1987), 70.

- 1. See discussion at Dan. 1:21 for the argument that Daniel's career actually stretched beyond Cyrus's first year.
- 2. Goldingay's attempt (Daniel, 4), based on studies by Van Selms, to connect the Hebrew spelling of the Babylonian king's Akkadian name [Nabu-kudurri-usur (Nabu protects the firstborn/boundary stone)] with an insulting etymology [Nabu-kudanu-usur ("Nabu protects the mule")] strikes me as overly speculative.
- 3. D. N. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty: A Story of Stories in Daniel 1-6 (JSOTSup 72; Sheffield: Almond, 1988), 34.
- 4. 2 Kings 24:1–4 narrates a later conflict between Nebuchadnezzar and Jehoiakim. After initially yielding to the Babylonians (2 Chron. 36:6–7; Dan. 1:1–3), Jehoiakim rebelled against them three years later. Before Nebuchadnezzar could respond, Jehoiakim died, leaving his young son, Jehoiachin, on the throne, to face the onslaught, being exiled himself in 598 B.C.
- 5. J. A. Montgomery, The Book of Daniel (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1927), 113, states "there is no historical corroboration of such an event in the third year of Jehoiakim."
- 6. See L. F. Hartman and A. A. DiLella, The Book of Daniel (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978), 48.

- 7. D. J. Wiseman, et al., Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel (London: Tyndale, 1965), 16–18.
- 8. G. F. Hasel, "The Book of Daniel: Evidences Relating to Persons and Chronology," AUSS 19 (1981): 47-49.
- 9. Wiseman, Notes on Some Problems, 18.
- 10. D. J. Wiseman, Nebuchadrezzar and Babylon (Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1985), 17.
- 11. A. K. Grayson, Assyrian and Babylonian Chronicles (Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1975), 99.
- 12. J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 131.
- 13. Wiseman, Nebuchadrezzar, 22.
- 14. See also the convenient summary of the period provided by T. R. Hobbs, 2 Kings (WBC; Waco, Tex.: Word, 1985), 348–49, though he passes over a siege of Jerusalem in 605, which may indicate that he does not accept Daniel 1:1–2 as reflecting historical reality.
- 15. Also in 605 B.C. Nabopolassar died, causing Nebuchadnezzar to quickly return to Babylon to secure the throne.
- 16. R. B. Dillard, 2 Chronicles (WBC; Waco, Tex.: Word, 1987), 299.
- 17. The Hebrew text has Shinar, see NIV footnote. According to R. Zadok, "The Origin of the Name Shinar," ZA 74 (1984): 240–44, Shinar is an anachronistic reference to Babylonia. Goldingay (Daniel, 15), on the basis of other Old Testament usage (see particularly Genesis 11:1–9), argues that the term "suggests a place of false religion, self-will, and self-aggrandizement."
- 18. In an interesting article, P. R. Ackroyd, "The Temple Vessels—A Continuity Theme," in Studies in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972), 166–79, describes the theological theme centered on the temple articles. To Ackroyd the text is not historical (esp. the reference in Dan. 1:2, cf. p. 180), but rather the removal and the restoration of the temple articles describes the continuity and discontinuity of Israel's relationship with God disrupted by the catastrophe of the Exile.
- 19. See 2 Kings 24:13; 25:13–17; Jer. 52:17–23.
- 20. Most commentators (see A. Lacocque, The Book of Daniel [Atlanta: John Knox, 1979], 21) recognize the Old Persian word for "inn" in his name, thus associating his name with his work of providing for the dining and lodging of the "school of the exiles." See also, Hartman and DiLella, The Book of Daniel, 129.
- 21. For instance, Rome had the practice of taking the children of other close relatives of client states and holding them "hostage." This practice was not punishment as much as security against rebellion. As these hostages lived in Rome, a high-ranking Roman family became their patron and they became acclimated to Roman ways, with the idea that they would be friends of Rome when they returned to their native lands. In the context of Daniel 11, we will note how this was also the experience of Antiochus IV and Demetrius.
- 22. J. L. Berquist, Judaism in Persia's Shadow: A Social and Historical Approach (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995), 15–16. Berquist differentiates these urban exiles who worked in the government bureaucracy from the rural exiles, who helped in food supply.
- 23. Dan. 1:6 describes Daniel and his three friends as "some" among the exiles chosen for training. We hear nothing of the others; the text focuses only on Daniel and his three friends.
- 24. J. Braverman, Jerome's Commentary on Daniel: A Study of Comparative Jewish and Christian Interpretations of the Hebrew Bible (CBQMS 7; Washington, D.C.: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1978), 67–68.
- 25. Cf. V. P. Hamilton, "NIDOTTE, 2:457–58.
- 26. This is true especially in the light of the fact that Daniel lives through the entire exilic period. Many commentators cite Greek evidence that Persian education began in the early teens. L. J. Wood (A Commentary on Daniel [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1973], 33), for example, states: "Plato (Alcibiades 1.121) says that the education of youths in Persia began at fourteen years, and Xenophon (Cyropaedia, I.2) speaks of the seventeenth year as the completion"; see also J. A. Montgomery, The Book of Daniel (ICC; Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1927), 122. Of course, this Persian evidence, if reliable, is of uncertain relevance to Babylon decades earlier.
- 27. Cf. J. B. Pritchard (ed.), The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1969).
- 28. See, for instance, B. R. Foster, Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (2 vols.; Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 1993).
- 29. J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Vision of the Book of Daniel (Missoula, Mont.: Scholars, 1977), 32 notes that Herodotus (5th century B.C.) provides the first attestation of the use of "Chaldean" in its professional sense.
- 30. Three of the most well-known series of omens from Mesopotamia are Enuma Anu Enlil, Summa Alu, and Summa Izbu.
- 31. Farber's article is found on pp. 1894–1906, in vol. 3 of J. Sasson (ed.), Civilizations of the Ancient Near East (New York: Scribers, 1995).
- 32. Although a learned discipline, Mesopotamian divination must be considered revelation from the divine realm according to J. Lawson, "The God Who Reveals Secrets': The Mesopotamian Background to Daniel 2:47," JSOT 74 (1997): 61–76. This point will be important not only here, but especially for the next chapter.
- 33. See Baldwin, Daniel, 81, citing Millard. Also note that Dan. 4:8 connects Daniel's new name with the name of Nebuchadnezzar's god.

- 34. Cf. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 36; Lacocque, The Book of Daniel, 29–30; E. J. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949), 43.
- 35. Braverman, Jerome's Commentary on Daniel, 53-71.
- 36. See G. H. Johnston, "プラウ," NIDOTTE, 3:293.
- 37. Cf. S. R. Miller, Daniel (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1994), 59.
- 38. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 36, cites this as a major motivation for Daniel.
- 39. Cf. R. E. Averbeck, "NIDOTTE, 1:794–96; see Ezra 2:62; Neh. 7:64; Isa. 59:3; Mal. 1:7, 12.
- 40. A. L. Oppenheim, Ancient Mesopotamia: Portrait of a Dead Civilization (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1964), 183–97.
- 41. See Baldwin, Daniel, 83; Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 40.
- 42. Cf. D. Soesilo, "Why Did Daniel Reject the King's Delicacies? (Daniel 1:8)," BT 45 (1994): 441–44. Note K. Koch, Daniel (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1986), 58–69, who concludes the goal of Daniel's diet is to cause a mystical frame of mind.
- 43. As Calvin points out in his commentary on Daniel, Daniel I (Chapters 1–6) (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993), 30. This is implied by Dan. 10:3, in that the effect of the vision kept Daniel from enjoying his normal diet of choice food, meat, and wine. We should add that if Daniel's motivations in chapter 1 were to keep kosher, avoid idolatrous defilement, or political entanglement, then we should question why his eating habits changed later in life.
- 44. As pointed out by W. S. Towner, "Daniel 1 in the Context of the Canon," in Canon, Theology and Old Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Brevard S. Childs (ed. G. M. Tucker, D. L. Petersen, and R. R. Wilson; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988), 288.
- 45. Literally, "ten times better" (see NIV). The number ten has the symbolic sense of "much" or "many"; cf. "Ten," in The Dictionary of Biblical Imagery, ed. by L. Ryken, J. Wilhoit, and T. Longman III (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, forthcoming).
- 46. Calvin, Daniel I, 27.
- 47. In the New Testament, God's use of pagan astrology to guide the wise men to the newly born Jesus may be an analogous situation (cf. Matt. 2:1–12).
- 48. Goldingay, Daniel, 27.
- 49. Cf. L. M. Wills, The Jew in the Court of the Foreign King (HDR; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990), 80.
- 50. Perhaps the intention of the verse is simply to say that Daniel was in the Babylonian court for the rest of its days. Or perhaps Young (The Prophecy of Daniel, 51–52) is correct when he argues that the first year of Cyrus is mentioned because of its importance for the Judeans and in effect means "first year and beyond."
- 51. J. Goldingay, "Story, Vision, Interpretation: Literary Approaches to Daniel," in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings, ed. A. S. van der Woude (Leuven: University Press, 1993), 298.
- 52. See J. H. Walton, L. D. Bailey, and C. Williford, "Bible-Based Curricula and the Crisis of Scriptural Authority," Journal of Christian Education 13 (1993): 83–94.
- 53. See T. Longman III and R. B. Dillard, "Hermeneutics and Counseling," IBC Perspective 2 (1987): 21–30.
- 54. Though, to be sure, Paul's specific reference is to another historical account in the Old Testament, the story of wanderings in the desert.
- 55. Cf. T. Longman III, Literary Approaches, 68-71.
- 56. Cf. G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM, 1970), 47, who identified Daniel 1–6 as didactic narrative and compares it to the Joseph story. Cf. H.-P. Muller, "Die weisheitliche Lehrerzahlung im Alten Testament und seiner Umwelt," WO 9 (1977): 77–98.
- 57. J. Crenshaw, "Method in Determining Wisdom Influence Upon 'Historical Literature," JBL 88 (1969): 129–42, while not addressing the issue of Daniel 1–6 directly, does raise questions about assigning these chapters to a wisdom genre per se
- 58. D. Hudson, "Come, Bring Your Story," Mars Hill 1 (1994): 73–86.
- 59. Cf. V. Philips Long, The Art of Biblical History (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994).
- 60. The term is Michael Novak's, cited by Ervin S. Duggan, "The Media and the Church Today," oral presentation at the Conference on Contemporary Issues at Westminster Theological Seminary (March 11, 1997), 3–6 in written transcripts.
- 61. J. D. Hunter, Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America (New York: Basic Books, 1991).
- 62. See the intriguing "behind the scenes" study of the religious antiabortion movement in J. Risen and J. L. Thomas, Wrath of Angels: The American Abortion War (New York: Basic Books, 1998).
- 63. See H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York: Harper and Row, 1951). The five categories, only four of which I discuss here, are: (1) Christ Against Culture; (2) The Christ of Culture; (3) Christ Above Culture; (4) Christ and Culture in Paradox; (5) Christ the Transformer of Culture. I have also benefited from Philip Yancey's interaction with Niebuhr's material; see his "A State of Ungrace," CT 41 (February 3, 1997): 31–37. See also his What's So Amazing about Grace (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1997).
- 64. See D. Allender and T. Longman III, Cry of the Soul (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1993), 41-53.

- 65. This point is not made by Yancey and indeed the extent to which Cromwell's zeal for Protestantism led to the defacing of church art is a matter of debate since royalist propaganda certainly magnified his actions. See the cautious appraisal by A. Frasier, Cromwell: The Lord Protector (New York: Knopf, 1974), 102–5.
- 66. D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Faith on Trial (London: Inver-Varsity Fellowship, 1965), 63.
- 67. For a call to the church to practice civility in our interaction with others with whom we disagree, see R. J. Mouw, Uncommon Decency: Christian Civility in an Uncivil World (Downers Grove, InterVarsity, 1992).
- 68. For a stirring example of how urban churches in Boston have been agents of transformation in their community, see J. Klein; "In God They Trust," The New Yorker (June 16, 1997), 40–49.

- 1. These parallels have been frequently noted by commentators: for instance Towner, Daniel, 29–31; Goldingay, Daniel, 37, 39. There is also a parallel with the Aramaic tale of Ahikar. For parallels with both the Joseph story and Ahikar, see S. Niditch and R. Doran, "The Success Story of the Wise Courtier: A Formal Approach," JBL 96 (1977): 179–93.
- 2. Goldingay, Daniel, 36.
- 3. In "A Life-Style for the Diaspora: A Study of the Tales of Esther and Daniel," JBL 92 (1973): 211–23, though this endorsement does not imply agreement concerning his views on the historicity of the story.
- 4. J. Lawson, "The God Who Reveals Secrets': The Mesopotamian Background to Daniel 2:47," JSOT 74 (1997): 61–76, makes the important point that Mesopotamian divination is a result of divine revelation, a point denied by many Old Testament interpreters. His article argues that "divine revelation (the revelation of 'secrets') was more commonplace in Mesopotamian culture than in Judaean, and that Daniel, rather than appearing as a Judaean wise man or prophet, appears more in the mould of a Mesopotamian mantic sage" (p. 61). This point will be important for our use of this chapter in the Contemporary Significance section.
- 5. Information about omens and dream interpretation in Mesopotamia is helpfully summarized in an article about divination in volume 3 of J. Sasson, Civilizations of the Ancient Near East (New York: Scribners, 1995).
- 6. All historians must grapple with the problem of gaps or apparent contradictions in their primary sources. Explanations that resolve the tension (harmonizations) are a common strategy of dealing with these issues. However, harmonizations are hypothetical constructions and are rarely certain. For an excellent treatment of harmonization as a method and a theological problem, see R. B. Dillard, "Harmonization: A Help and a Hindrance," in Inerrancy and Hermeneutics, ed. H. M. Conn (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1988), 151–64.
- 7. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 48–50. Interestingly, D. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 55, suggests that the fact that the king needs an introduction to Daniel, though the text refers to him as Belteshazzar, indicates that the scene is set within the period of training. However, the conclusion of the story throws this in doubt since Daniel/Belteshazzar does not return to training, but is immediately promoted. Fewell herself refers to this as a "tension" that "raises the question of the narrator's reliability" (62).
- 8. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 56. Young bases his views on an earlier suggestion by S. R. Driver, The Book of Daniel (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1900), p. 17. This approach is rejected by J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1993), 154–55.
- 9. See the interesting argument of J. H. Sims, "Daniel," in A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible, eds. L. Ryken and T. Longman III (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995), 326–30, that Daniel's historical "inaccuracies' are an integral part of the book's literary technique."
- 10. As studied in the classic study by A. L. Oppenheim, The Interpretation of Dreams in the Ancient Near East (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1956). See also footnote 4.
- 11. Goldingay, Daniel, 46, is content to leave it ambiguous.
- 12. Baldwin, Daniel, 87–88. The difference arises over a debate concerning the meaning of the word azda, which the NIV rightly takes as "firm," based on the supposition that it is a Persian loanword, as opposed to the KJV, which takes the word as derived from a Hebrew verb that means "to go away" (cf. discussion in Miller, Daniel, 81).
- 13. Also, it renders the continual pleading of the dream interpreters meaningless.
- 14. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 58-59.
- 15. So, W. S. Towner, "The Poetic Passages of Daniel 1–6," CBQ 31 (1969): 317; G. T. M. Prinsloo, "Two Poems in a Sea of Prose: The Content and Context of Daniel 2:20–23 and 6:27–28," JSOT 59 (1993): 96, who says "the poem has much in common with traditional Israelite poetry (cf. Job 12:13; Pss. 41:14; 106:48; 113:2; Neh. 9:5; Est. 1:13) and could be described as a psalm of thanksgiving with a hymnic character."
- 16. Daniel's prayer of thanks comes before we, as readers, are informed of the details of the answer. Thus, in the words of J. W. Watts, "Daniel's Praise (Daniel 2:20–23)," in Psalm and Story: Inset Hymns in Hebrew Narrative (Sheffield: JSOT, 1992), 150, "Daniel's Praise [sic] becomes ... an expression of trust that the expected deliverance will be brought to fruition."

- 17. Calvin, Daniel I, 76–77.
- 18. Collins, Daniel, 162.
- 19. Detailed accounts may be found in G. F. Hasel, "The Four World Empires of Daniel 2 Against Its Near Eastern Environment," JSOT 12 (1979): 17–30; D. Flusser, "The Four Empires in the Fourth Sibyl and in the Book of Daniel," IOS 2 (1972): 148–75. See also E. C. Lucas, "The Origin of Daniel's Four Empires Scheme Re-Examined," TynBul 40 (1989): 185–202, who persuasively argues against the view that Daniel 2 derives from Persian apocalyptic imagery. Rather, he sees Daniel 2 and the Persian ideas as "independent adaptations" (201) of the earlier schema represented by Hesiod.
- 20. However, P. R. Davies, "Daniel Two," JTS 27 (1976): 399, argues that the different parts of the statue represent three successors of Nebuchadnezzar: Amel-Marduk, Neriglissar, and Nabonidus, while the rock stands for Cyrus.
- 21. Cf. Towner, Daniel, 115.
- 22. For instance, the marriage of Berenice to Antiochus II in 252 B.C. or Cleopatra to Ptolomy Epiphanes in 193–192 B.C. (cf. Collins, Daniel, 170).
- 23. R. J. M. Gurney, "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel 2 and 7," Themelios 2 (1977): 39–45; J. Walton, "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel," JETS 29 (1986): 25–36.
- 24. Miller, Daniel, 97, 99, represents a dispensationalist approach, which takes the ten toes as "kingdoms (or nations) of unequal strength will unite to form a coalition that will rise out of the ruins of the ancient Roman Empire." Most other interpreters, myself included, note that the text itself makes no symbolic interpretation of the number of toes.
- 25. Our view is close to that of Goldingay, Daniel, 58, but we do not share his views on the late dating of the book.
- 26. D. Wenham, "The Kingdom of God and Daniel," ExpTim 98 (1987): 132–34, persuasively argues that Dan. 2 and 7 provides "the primary background for the New Testament concept of the Kingdom of God."
- 27. Calvin, Daniel I, 97.
- 28. The account comes from Josephus, Jewish Antiquities, 11.331–35, and is quoted in B. A. Mastin, "Daniel 2:46 and the Hellenistic World," ZAW 85 (1973): 87.
- 29. Noted by Calvin (Daniel I, 110) well before the current literary analysis: "We know many things were omitted in their narratives," which led him to suspend judgment as to Daniel's reaction.
- 30. Mastin, "Daniel 2:46," 85, though we are on less secure grounds arguing for this since Mastin believes the book was written in the Hellenistic period, and we are making the assumption that the practice was also current in the neo-Babylonian period.
- 31. See P. P. Zerafa, The Wisdom of God in the Book of Job (Rome: Herder, 1978); R. B. Dillard and T. Longman III, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994), 200–210.
- 32. See T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998).
- 33. For one of the best defenses of this viewpoint, see W. Grudem, The Gift of Prophecy in the New Testament and Today (Westchester, Ill.: Crossway, 1988).
- 34. The interested reader is urged to look at Grudem (ibid.) and R. Gaffin, Perspectives on Pentecost (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979), for opposing views on the subject.
- 35. D. Goleman, Emotional Intelligence (New York: Bantam, 1995).
- 36. Ibid., 34–36.
- 37. Ibid., xii.
- 38. Ibid., 34.
- 39. See L. Ryken, J. Wilhort, and T. Longman III, eds., The Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downer Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998).
- 40. See Collins, Daniel, 171, who also points out that "the messianic interpretation is ... found in rabbinic literature."

- 1. The LXX felt the tension and filled in the gap by saying that this episode took place in the king's eighteenth year. This is likely an attempt to associate the ceremony with a celebration of his taking of Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 52:29) and is improbable.
- 2. A similar type of narrative occurs in Dan. 6, the account of Daniel in the lion's den. In ch. 11 we read a tale of court contest.
- 3. J. J. Collins, Daniel; First Maccabees; Second Maccabees, With an Excursus on the Apocalyptic Genre (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1981), 41.
- 4. For a translation of this material, see ibid., 38–39.

- 5. Dura is an Akkadian word meaning "wall" or "fortress" and "is common in the geographical nomenclature of Mesopotamia" (J. S. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1950], 197; cf. Chicago Assyrian Dictionary, vol. 10, p. x). We cannot be dogmatic about a specific location.
- 6. The Aramaic text reads the measurements in cubits: sixty cubits high and six cubits wide, reflecting the sexgesimal system in use in Babylon.
- 7. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 84, says that all Babylonian sculpture was grotesque, an expression of personal taste not shared by the present writer.
- 8. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 80.
- 9. Collins, Daniel, 180.
- 10. Also Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 80.
- 11. Fewell, Circles of Sovereignty, 66.
- 12. Ibid., 68.
- 13. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 84.
- 14. See Lacocque, The Book of Daniel, 58, fn. 1.
- 15. A major debate surrounds the translation of this verse from the Aramaic. It is possible on grammatical grounds to defend the translation of the NRSV ("If our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the furnace of blazing fire and out of your hand, O king, let him deliver us"), but as many commentators have pointed out, this is unlikely from a theological perspective, and the NIV's translation is also philologically defensible (Miller, Daniel, 119). For a lengthy discussion of the issue, cf. P. Coxon, "Daniel 3:17: A Linguistic and Theological Problem," VT 26 (1976): 400–405.
- 16. For instance, Miller, Daniel, 115.
- 17. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 94, and most other conservative commentators argue strongly for this view.
- 18. I want to thank John Walton for this helpful point.
- 19. An excellent discussion may be found in A. L. Oppenheim, Ancient Mesopotamia: Portrait of a Dead Civilization (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1964).
- 20. Perhaps similar to the way that icons of Mary and the saints are treated in some regions of the world.
- 21. Sophisticated Babylonians would not have strictly identified the idol with their god.
- 22. I would like to thank John Walton for his insightful comments on this topic expressed in this paragraph.
- 23. See the phrase used throughout P. Tillich, Systematic Theology (3 vols.; Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1951–1963).
- 24. Towner, Daniel, 54.
- 25. V. Frankl, Man's Search for Meaning: An Introduction to Logotherapy (3d ed.; New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984),
- 26. See D. Allender and T. Longman III, Bold Purpose (forthcoming Tyndale House, 1998).
- 27. F. Nietzsche, "Upon the Blessed Isles," Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Second Part, quoted from W. Kaufmann (ed.), The Portable Nietzsche (New York: Viking, 1968), 199–200.
- 28. Thus Spoke Zarathustra, 196, quoted in B. Ingraffia, Postmodern Theory and Biblical Theology (Cambridge Univ. Press, 1997), 96.
- 29. It is true we are created in the image of God, but we only reflect the glory of God in a derivative manner. For a further discussion, see D. Allender and T. Longman III, Intimate Allies (Wheaton, Ill.: Tyndale, 1995), 28–41.
- 30. I am indebted to Towner, Daniel, 51, for the discussion and Scripture texts quoted in this paragraph.
- 31. Calvin, Daniel I, 143.

- 1. Grammatically, this expression is ambiguous and could be translated "the spirit of the (holy) God" with reference to Yahweh, but Nebuchadnezzar's use of such a phrase at this stage of the story would be strange. See B. Becking, "A Divine Spirit Is in You': Notes on the Translation of the Phrase ruah lahim* in Daniel 5,14 and Related Texts," in *The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings (Leuven: University Press, 1993), 515–19.
- 2. N. W. Porteus, Daniel: A Commentary (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965), 65, rightly argues the pivotal nature of Dan. 4:25 in the chapter.
- 3. Note that Dan. 2:4b-7:28 is written in Aramaic rather than in Hebrew.
- 4. See the discussion in Collins, Daniel, 221.
- A helpful discussion may be found in Collins, Daniel, 217–18. The Prayer of Nabonidus was first published in 1956 by J. T. Milik; cf. F. M. Cross, "Fragments of the Prayer of Nabonidus," IEJ 34 (1984): 260–64.

- 6. Eusebius refers to this as the book of Abydenus, "Concerning the Assyrians"; cf. Collins, Daniel, 218–19, who gives a translation of the text.
- 7. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 89.
- 8. Porteous, Daniel, 67, points out that Nebuchadnezzar's language, particularly in Dan. 4:3, is similar to that found in the hymns of the Psalter (esp. Ps. 145:13).
- 9. Cf. Collins, Daniel, 22; Longman, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography.
- 10. S. Parpola, "The Assyrian Tree of Life: Tracing the Origins of Jewish Monotheism and Greek Philosophy," JNES 52 (1993): 167.
- 11. Ibid., 167-68.
- 12. Though there it usually refers to evil or fallen angels, cf. the Book of the Watchers (I Enoch 1–36).
- 13. A helpful discussion may be found in P. Coxon, "The Great Tree of Daniel 4," in A Word in Season, J. D. Martin and P. R. Davies, eds. (Sheffield: JSOT, 1986), for the argument that the seven periods are symbolic rather than indicative of any specific time indicator (94), and for the assertion that the bands are of cultic significance (105).
- 14. M. Roaf, Cultural Atlas of Mesopotamia and the Ancient Near East (New York: Facts on File, 1990), 192–93. Of course, Herodotus's report would be a century after Nebuchadnezzar, but the city's opulence was at its height under Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed, he built the Hanging Gardens for his Median queen since she was used to hilly forests, not the flat plain on which Babylon was built.
- 15. Calvin, Daniel I, 189-90.
- 16. Many scholars (cf. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 112; Baldwin, Daniel, 109) diagnose Nebuchadnezzar's illness as boathronpy or lycanthropy, where a human being thinks himself or herself as an ox, dog, or wolf. According to Baldwin, it is rarely seen today because the mentally ill are less likely to be allowed to roam the countryside.

John Walton in a personal communication has drawn my attention to the fact that the description of Nebuchadnezzar's "symptoms" is not very different from common Mesopotamian descriptions of those who are outside of civilization. Enkidu in the Gilgamesh Epic, Ahiqar in exile, the citizens of destroyed cities in city laments, Lugalbanda when abandoned by his companions—all are described in beast-like terms. Nebuchadnezzar considered himself the founder of Babylonian civilization, and he was driven out of it.

- 17. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 101.
- 18. See above, pp. 26-27.
- 19. Christianity Today 41 (September 1, 1997): 70–71, 86–87.
- 20. See P. Coxon, "Another Look at Nebuchadnezzar's Madness," in The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings, ed. A. S. van der Woude (Leuven: University Press, 1993), 211–21.
- 21. We will reserve further discussion of this topic until the later chapters of Daniel, as the book's focus turns from the stories centered in foreign courts to an account of Daniel's vision of the future. G. K. Beale's point that Christ's title in Rev. 17:14 has its origin in Daniel 4:37 is relevant here. He argues that "by the application of this title to Christ, the author may view God's sovereign humbling of the King of Babylon in Dan 4 as a typological prophecy of Christ's sovereign defeat of the end-time foe who is closely associated with eschatological Babylon" (see "The Origin of the Title 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords' in Revelation 17.14," NTS 31 (1985): 620.
- 22. For a helpful examination of false shame, see L. B. Smedes, Shame and Grace: Healing the Shame We Don't Deserve (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993).
- 23. The quote from Heb. 12:2 and the concluding paragraph are taken from D. B. Allender and T. Longman III, Cry of the Soul (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1993), 209; see chapters 14 and 15 for a more extensive discussion of the destructive power and redeeming possibilities of shame.

- 1. See her discussion in Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 114–16, 138–39.
- 2. Though doubt is still entertained by some concerning the way Belshazzar is described in Dan. 5, cf. J. J. Collins, Daniel With an Introduction to Apocalyptic Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984), 68.
- 3. For more on the story as well as the actual documentation concerning Belshazzar's role, see the excellent book by P.-A. Beaulieu, The Reign of Nabonidus, King of Babylon 556–539 B.C. (New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1989). An earlier helpful treatment from an apologetic point of view is M. J. Gruenthaner, "The Last King of Babylon," CBQ 11 (1949): 406–25. For a more popular treatment, see A. Millard, "Daniel and Belshazzar in History," BAR 11 (1985): 73–78
- 4. See for instance, Collins, Daniel With an Introduction to Apocalyptic Literature, 68.
- 5. For a comprehensive discussion of his issue, consult Miller, Daniel, 149–50.
- 6. See K. Jobes, Esther (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, forthcoming).

- 7. Goldingay, Daniel, 106-7.
- 8. So Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 124.
- 9. Though by having them removed from the temple and allowing nonpriestly hands touch them, he was guilty of profaning them himself.
- 10. Miller, Daniel, 154, makes this point and believes it is possible.
- 11. So A. Wolters, "Untying the King's Knots: Physiology and Wordplay in Daniel 5," JBL 110 (1991): 117–22.
- 12. See Miller, Daniel, 155, citing R. Koldewey, The Excavations at Babylon (London: Macmillan, 1914).
- 13. So Lacocque, The Book of Daniel, 94.
- 14. Though Gruenthaner, "The Last King of Babylon," 421, argues that the expression really means a high official, not specifically the third most powerful.
- 15. See Longman, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography, 158-61; also see Beaulieu, The Reign of Nabonidus, 68-79.
- 16. See Collins, Daniel, 248.
- 17. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 124.
- 18. Calvin, Daniel I, 222.
- 19. Ibid., 223.
- 20. See Miller, Daniel, 165, where he argues, I think unnecessarily and unpersuasively, that they really are verbs, not nouns, and the strange forms may be explained by accents (see Collins, Daniel, 250–52; Goldingay, Daniel, 110–11, who both cite an earlier study by C. Clermont-Ganneau, "Mane, thecel, phares et le festin de Balthasar," JA 8 [1886]: 36–67, and argue that the oracle had an earlier form and meaning, though Goldingay places the importance on the interpretation offered in the book by Daniel himself).
- 21. Towner, Daniel, 76.
- 22. Goldingay, Daniel, p. 111.
- 23. A. Wolters, "The Riddle of the Scales in Daniel 5," HUCA 62 (1991): 155.
- 24. Ibid.
- 25. M. Hilton, "Babel Revisited—Daniel 5," JSOT 66 (1995): 99–112.
- 26. See V. Philips Long, The Art of Biblical History (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994).
- 27. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic Books, 1981), 114–30; A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (Sheffield: Almond, 1983), 99–101.
- 28. We should also bring into view the culmination of God's judgment. Though we cannot see his judgment displayed consistently in the present world—the wicked sometimes prosper and the righteous sometimes perish—we know that an ultimate day of reckoning is coming. The Bible clearly teaches that those who rebel will receive what they deserve if they do not turn to Christ. This will become clearer in the last part of the book of Daniel, so we will develop the theme of judgment later.
- 29. I have tried to take a first step in this regard in "Reading the Bible Postmodernly," Mars Hill Review (forthcoming in Fall, 1998).
- 30. As done recently by C. Bartholomew, "Reading the Old Testament in Postmodern Times," TynBul 49 (1998): 91-114.
- 31. D. J. A. Clines, "A World Established on Water (Psalm 24): Reader-Response, Deconstruction and Bespoke Criticism," in The New Literary Criticism, ed. J. Cheryl Exum and D. J. A. Clines (Valley Forge, Pa.: Trinity Press International, 1993), 79–90.

- For a detailed discussion of the issue and a presentation of the preferred solution, see R. B. Dillard and T. Longman III, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994), 334–37.
- 2. J. C. Whitcomb, Darius the Mede: A Study in Historical Identification (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959).
- 3. D. J. Wiseman, et al. Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel (London: Tyndale, 1965), 12-16.
- W. H. Shea, "An Unrecognized Vassal King of Babylon in the Early Achaemenid Period," AUSS 9 (1971): 51–67, 99– 128; 10 (1972): 88–117.
- 5. Goldingay, Daniel, 122; Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 143.
- 6. T. A. Boogaart, "Daniel 6: A Tale of Two Empires," The Reformed Review 39-40 (1985-1987): 107.
- 7. For evidence that "satrap" can be used on a smaller scale, see Collins, Daniel, 264, though Collins himself still believes there is a confusion here with the later Darius.
- 8. At least symbolically, since it lasts only thirty days.
- 9. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 145.

- 10. Ibid., 146.
- 11. J. Walton, "The Decree of Darius the Mede in Daniel 6," JETS 31 (1988): 280.
- 12. The statement that the law of the Persians and Medes was unable to be repealed has been debated and discussed, but the same theme may be found in the book of Esther (Esth. 1:19; 8:8) as well as the Greek historian Diodorus Siculus (17.30). Further, paragraph 5 of Hammurapi's law code indicates that it was a crime for a judge to change his decision (cf. Hartman and DiLella, The Book of Daniel, 199).
- 13. Collins, Daniel, 268.
- 14. Cf. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 150.
- 15. Tikva Frymer-Kensky, "The Judicial Ordeal in the Ancient Near East" (Ph.D. dissertation: New Haven, Conn.: Yale University, 1977).
- 16. Though it is possible to understand events like the Flood or the crossing of the Red Sea as an ordeal in which the innocent survive and the guilty are killed.
- 17. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty, 154.
- 18. Cf. pp.57-61.
- 19. Cf. pp. 26-27.
- 20. See P. D. Miller Jr., Sin and Judgment in the Prophets (Chico, Calif.: Scholars, 1982).
- 21. Taken from personal conversations with Bob Fu and an article summarizing Bob and Heidi's story in C. Jones, "House Church Leader Granted Asylum in the USA," China Prayer Letter and Ministry Report 144 (November–December 1997): 1–5.
- 22. Towner, Daniel, 85.
- 23. Towner, Daniel, 84–85; Goldingay, Daniel, 136.

- 1. We should note, however, that certain characteristics link the two sections (see Introduction). For instance, Daniel 7 is in the Aramaic language as are chapters 2–6. Hebrew begins again with chapter 8. Also, the four-kingdom scheme of Daniel's vision in the present chapter reminds us of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the statue in chapter 2.
- 2. For more on apocalyptic literature in the Bible, see T. Longman III, Reading the Bible with Heart and Mind (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1997), 213–26; Fictional Akkadian Autobiography (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1991), 166–90.
- 3. Miller, Daniel, 195.
- 4. Goldingay, Daniel, 139, supported by G. Hasel, "The First and Third Years of Belshazzar (Dan. 7:1; 8:1)," AUSS 15 (1976): 153-68.
- See J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1975); C. Kloos, Yhwh's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Leiden: Brill, 1986); M. K. Wakeman, God's Battle with the Monster: A Study in Biblical Imagery (Leiden: Brill, 1973).
- 6. W. G. Lambert, "A New Look at the Babylonian Background of Genesis," JTS 16 (1968): 287–300, warns that Mesopotamian conceptions of creation probably changed over the period of more than a millennium, in which Akkadian was the lingua franca of the Near East; but the Enuma Elish certainly reflects the majority opinion of Marduk priesthood, which was dominant during those times when the city of Babylon was the central power of the region.
- The text may be found most conveniently in ANET, 60–72. For more recent translations, consult B. R. Foster, Before the Muses (Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 1993), 354–402; W. W. Hallo, ed., The Context of Scripture (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 390–402.
- 8. It may be found in ANET, 129–42; also M. D. Coogan, Stories from Ancient Canaan (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978), 75–115.
- 9. T. Jacobsen, "The Battle Between Marduk and Tiamat," JAOS 88 (1968): 104–8, has persuasively argued that the myth originated among Northwest Semites like the Canaanites and then was adopted by the Mesopotamians.
- 10. The text is broken after the defeat of Yam, but most scholars believe that the lost portion may have recounted creation.
- 11. See T. Longman III and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995), 64-69.
- 12. M. Roaf, Cultural Atlas of Mesopotamia and the Ancient Near East (New York: Facts on File, 1990), provides a picture of a Mesopotamian winged bull with a human head (163) and a winged lion with eagles' feet and horns (196–97).
- 13. We saw in ch. 1 how Daniel would have been aware of these texts.
- 14. P. A. Porter, Metaphors and Monsters: A Literary-Critical Study of Daniel 7 and 8 (ConBOT 20; Lund: CWK Gleerup, 1983).
- 15. Such as E. J. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949), 275–94.

- 16. For the classic exposition of a "critical" approach to this imagery, see H. H. Rowley, Darius the Mede and the Four World Empires in the Book of Daniel (San Diego, Calif.: Cardiff, 1935). But two evangelicals have also made a persuasive case for this approach as well: R. J. M. Gurney, God in Control: An Exposition of the Prophecies of Daniel (Worthing: Walter, 1980); J. H. Walton, "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel," JETS 29 (1986): 25–36.
- 17. See pp. 81–83 for arguments for and against both of these approaches.
- 18. Cf. the convoluted arguments of someone like Hal Lindsey, The Late Great Planet Earth (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970), who sees in the European Common Market (now the European Union) as the fulfillment of the ten horns of Daniel 7.
- 19. R. J. M. Gurney, "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel 2 and 7," Themelios 2 (1977): 43.
- 20. Walton, "The Four Kingdoms of Daniel," 30.
- 21. So Gurney, "Kingdoms," 43–44.
- 22. Goldingay, Daniel, 164-65; Collins, Daniel, 303.
- 23. See ANET, 134.
- 24. For an excellent concise discussion of the issue, see Collins, Daniel, 313-17.
- 25. Cf. V. S. Poythress, "The Holy Ones of the Most High in Daniel vii," VT 26 (1976): 208–13.
- 26. Of course, most advocates of this approach argue that this is failed prophecy, which leads to later reinterpretation. See R. P. Carroll, When Prophecy Failed: Cognitive Dissonance in the Prophetic Traditions of the Old Testament (New York: Seabury, 1979). Such a view is unacceptable to those who believe that Daniel is a divinely inspired prophet.
- 27. Note the highly symbolic nature of the numbers in this section, "four" and "ten"; cf. The Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998).
- 28. Miller, Daniel, p. 215, for instance, comments "the Hebrew equivalent of this phrase occurs in 12:7 and is taken to approximate the 1,290 days of 12:11 and the 1,335 days of 12:12, both of which are just over three and a half years." But the point is that they are "over" not the same.
- 29. So Lacocque, The Book of Daniel, 153-54.
- 30. See C. F. Keil, Ezekiel, Daniel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975 [reprint]), 242-45.
- 31. December 15, 1997 (pp. 62–71).
- 32. Lindsey, The Late Great Planet Earth (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970).
- 33. J. Walvoord, Armageddon, Oil, and the Mid-East Crisis (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1974 [revised 1991]); C. Dyer, The Rise of Babylon (Wheaton: Tyndale, 1991).
- 34. H. Camping, 1994? (New York: Vantage, 1992).
- 35. For a fuller description of my approach to apocalyptic, see "What I Mean by Historical-Grammatical Exegesis—Why I Am Not a Literalist," GTJ 11 (1990): 37–55.
- 36. C. Plantinga Jr, Not the Way It's Supposed to Be: A Breviary of Sin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 16.
- 37. See the works by W. Wink, Engaging the Powers: Discernment and Resistance in a World of Domination (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1992); Naming the Powers: The Language of Power in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); Unmasking the Powers: The Invisible Forces That Determine Human Existence (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); When the Powers Fall: Reconciliation in the Healing of Nations (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1998); R. Mouw, Politics and the Biblical Drama (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976).
- 38. G. Steiner, No Passion Spent (New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1996), 235. For a Christian assessment, see the powerful work by M. Volf, Exclusion and Embrace: A Theological Exploration of Identity, Otherness, and Reconciliation (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996).
- 39. G. K. Beale, The Use of Daniel in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature and in the Revelation of St. John (Washington, D.C.: Univ. Press of America, 1984).
- 40. M. Kreft, "The Influence of the 'Holy War' Motif on Pauline Theology" (Th.M. thesis: Westminster Theological Seminary, 1985); D. Allender and T. Longman III, Bold Love (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1991).
- 41. See comments on Daniel 1.

- 1. In an interesting study contributing to the history of interpretation of the apocalyptic portions of Daniel, S. Nunez (The Vision of Daniel 8: Interpretations from 1700 to 1800 [Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews Univ. Press, 1987]), in his description of a host of interpreters in the period covered by his research, demonstrates the wide-ranging agreement on the interpretation of the imagery of chapter 8. This is not without exception, however, as our comments on the 2300 evenings and mornings will show.
- 2. Collins, Daniel, 329-30, reminds us that animals also represent leaders and nations in the Animal Apocalypse of 1 Enoch.

- 3. G. Hasel, "The First and Third Years of Belshazzar (Dan. 7:1; 8:1)," AUSS 15 (1976): 153ff.
- 4. Josephus, Antiquities, 10.11.7; G. Archer, "Daniel," EBC (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1985), 101.
- 5. Susa was a little over two hundred miles east of Babylon.
- 6. Collins, Daniel, 329.
- 7. Towner, Daniel, 116, cf. the comments of E. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990), 292–93, relevant to the existence of Susa during the neo-Babylonian period. Indeed, he states that "Susa was occupied continuously from 3500 B.C. to the thirteenth century A.D." (283).
- 8. See discussion on p. 189.
- 9. So Miller, Daniel, 227.
- 10. So Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 172.
- 11. P. J. Els. "NIDOTTE, 3:733–35.
- 12. The Hebrew literally says that the voice came from "between the Ulai" (8:16).
- 13. Gabriel is the first angel to be named in the Bible. He appears again in the New Testament to announce ahead of time the great acts of redemption about to take place (cf. Luke 1:19, 26).
- 14. Wood, A Commentary on Daniel, 223–24.
- 15. In the words of Keil, "Time of the end' is the general prophetic expression for the time which, as the period of fulfillment, lies at the end of the existing prophetic horizon—in the present case the time of Antiochus," quoted in Miller, Daniel, 231.
- 16. The argument has been made by many scholars that the specific symbolism of the ram and the goat originate in the zodiac. The argument is primarily based on the writings of a first century A.D. author named Teucer, who places Persia under the sign of the ram and Syria under the sign of the goat. Collins, Daniel, 330, raises doubts about the approach, however, by pointing to the late date of this information (even assuming a middle second century B.C. date for the prophecy as he does) and also by the fact that the goat is the sign for Syria, not Greece.
- 17. Actually, Alexander was not born until two months after Alexander the Great's death. Herakles's claim to the throne was likely a hoax.
- 18. As argued by Goldingay, Daniel, 213.
- 19. See pages 178-79.
- 20. H. Camping, 1994? (New York: Vantage, 1993).
- 21. See S. D. O'Leary, Arguing the Apocalypse: A Theory of Millennial Rhetoric (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1994).
- 22. See the argument by J. Doukhan, Daniel: The Vision of the End (Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews Univ. Press, 1987). In the midst of my critical comment on Adventist origins I want to be quick to point out that there is much of great value in the teachings of the Adventist church and that some of the best Old Testament scholars today are Adventist.
- 23. See the insightful comments of A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979).
- 24. A surprising number of them whose name in some fashion spells out 666, from Nero on.

- 1. See the discussion on pages 157–59. If Darius is not the Babylonian throne name for Cyrus, he is likely ruling at the behest of this Persian emperor.
- 2. As in Hartman and DiLella, The Book of Daniel, 245-46.
- 3. Towner, Daniel, 129-39.
- 4. M. Kline, Treaty of the Great King (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963); J. Niehaus, God at Sinai (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995).
- 5. For instance, Collins, Daniel, 348.
- 6. R. E. Winkle, "Jeremiah's Seventy Weeks for Babylon: A Reassessment, Part II: The Historical Data," AUSS 25 (1987): 289–99, is an unsuccessful attempt to place the start at events in 609 B.C.
- 7. "Numbers," in The Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998).
- 8. W. L. Holladay, Jeremiah I: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 668–69.
- 9. Towner, Daniel, 130.
- 10. Or perhaps, as suggested in the previous paragraph, the seventy "sevens" are seen as prolonging the just completed seventy-year Exile.
- 11. Collins, Daniel, 353.

- 12. A close reading shows an ambiguous relationship between the first seven "sevens" and the next sixty-two. The NIV (see also the NJB and NLT) reads the two periods together as stretching from the decree to the appearance of the Anointed One, motivated no doubt in part by a desire to associate the Anointed One with Christ. Other versions and interpreters understand the two periods as separate, with the Anointed One appearing after the first seven "sevens" (cf. NRSV; REB; NAB).
- 13. Several ancient Near Eastern treaties may be found in English translation in ANET, 201-6, 529-35.
- 14. O. P. Robertson, The Christ of the Covenants (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1980), 271.
- 15. Ibid., 276.
- 16. From O. P. Robertson, The Christ of the Covenants (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980), 62.
- 17. For further discussion, see T. Longman III, Reading the Bible with Heart and Mind (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1997), 113–28.
- 18. A helpful discussion may be found in B. K. Waltke, "Theonomy in Relation to Dispensational and Covenant Theologies," Theonomy: A Reformed Critique ed. W. Barker and R. Godfrey (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), 59–87.
- 19. As Wink, When the Powers Fall, 18, puts it: "We can repent, in fact, precisely because God has already forgiven us."
- 20. J. Miller and B. Miller Juliani, Come Back, Barbara, 2d ed. (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1997).
- 21. Wink, When the Powers Fall, 14.

- 1. For a brief discussion of the potential conflict between this date and the note that Daniel remained in Babylon until the first year of Cyrus, see comments on Dan. 1:21. It is true that the LXX has "first year of Cyrus," but as Hartman and DiLella point out (The Book of Daniel, 262), this is likely an attempt to harmonize the two references.
- 2. For discussion of the meaning and significance of this name, see comments on chapter 1.
- 3. It is interesting to note that this time overlaps the observance of Passover and the Feast of the Unleavened Bread, which took place from the fourteenth day to the twenty-first day of the first month (Num. 28:16–25).
- 4. The "great river" in the Bible was usually the Euphrates, which marked the lower boundary of Mesopotamia (cf. Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; Josh. 1:4, etc.). The Tigris, marking the upper boundary of Mesopotamia, is mentioned twice in the Bible (cf. also Gen. 2:14), only here being described as "the great river." Daniel's exact location on the Tigris is not given, but the general location situates him away from the city of Babylon (which is on the Euphrates).
- 5. C. Rowland, The Open Heaven (New York: Crossroad, 1982), 99.
- 6. Towner, Daniel, 152.
- 7. Cf. also Dan. 9:23; 10:19.
- 8. Today, the ultraorthodox Jewish community sometimes goes by the name <code>haredi</code> ("tremblers"), one source of their name being this chapter in Daniel. Another name for the same group is <code>hasidim</code>, from the Hebrew word <code>hesed</code>, which means "covenant lovingkindness."
- 9. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 225.
- 10. Miller, Daniel, 281-82.
- 11. Calvin, Daniel 7–12, 252; cf. W. H. Shea, "Wrestling With the Prince of Persia: A Study on Daniel 10," AUSS 21 (1983): 235.
- 12. Here we side, as do the majority of modern scholars, with the reading found in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the LXX (the NIV footnote). The Hebrew Masoretic text, represented in the main text in the NIV, is likely the result of scribal nervousness over the theology represented by the original text. In other words, in the light of Israel's later repeated apostasies, the scribes may have worried that the verse sounded too close to the polytheism that so tempted Israel.
- 13. This also shows that the conflict is not just about the response to Daniel's prayer.
- 14. As Miller, Daniel, 286–87, points out: "'In the future' is a translation of the Hebrew be'aharit hayyamim, usually rendered 'in the latter days.' Normally the phrase describes events that will recur just prior to and including the coming of the kingdom of God upon the earth...." If this were clearly the case, it would provide a strong argument supporting the argument that the latter parts of chapter 11 refer to the future Antichrist. However, as Collins points out (Daniel, 161), that is not clearly the case, since the Hebrew phrase can refer to "a definitive change in the future but not to an end of history."
- 15. For a much fuller discussion, see T. Longman III and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995).
- 16. For this reason, some, like R. Smend (Yahweh War and Tribal Confederation [Nashville: Abingdon, 1970]), prefer the term "Yahweh war."
- 17. T. Longman III, "Psalm 98: A Divine Warrior Victory Song," JETS 27 (1984): 267-74.
- 18. W. Moran, "The End of the Unholy War and the Anti-Exodus," Bib 44 (1963): 333-42.

- 19. Genesis 3 and Daniel 10 are not the only texts in the Old Testament where the cosmic battle is described. In many of the texts where God is seen locked in combat with the sea or Leviathan (see comments on Dan. 7:2), we may well have allusion to spiritual realities (cf. Ps. 18:14–15; 24:1–2; 29:10; 74:12–17; Isa. 27:1; Nah. 1:4a). For more, consult chapter 5, "God Wars Against the Forces of Chaos," in Reid and Longman, God Is a Warrior (72–82).
- 20. K. Sempangi, A Distant Grief (Glendale, Calif.: Regal Books, 1979).
- 21. Differences abound among those who advocate this brand of spiritual warfare. A helpful introduction to the topic, written by supporters like George Otis Jr., Cindy Jacobs, Kjell Sjoberg, and Victor Lorenzo, has been edited by C. P. Wagner, Breaking Strongholds in Your City: How to Use Spiritual Mapping to Make Your Prayers More Strategic, Effective and Targeted (Ventura, Calif.: Regal, 1993).
- 22. C. Arnold, Three Crucial Questions About Spiritual Warfare (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1997).
- 23. Ibid., 161.

- 1. Cf. A. K. Grayson, Babylonian Historical-Literary Texts (Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1975). For the fullest discussion of this text (and other similar Akkadian texts) and its connections to Daniel, see T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1991), 131–95.
- 2. See Goldingay, Daniel, 282–86, who uses the term quasi-prophecy to describe this literary phenomenon.
- 3. Ibid., 310–12.
- 4. Goldingay strengthens his argument with an appeal to the work of S. Niditch, "The Visionary," in Ideal Figures in Ancient Judaism, ed. by J. J. Collins and G. W. Nickelsburg (Chicago: Scholars, 1980), 153–79, who asserts, on the basis of comparative anthropological evidence, that the author of the book of Daniel actually had an experience through which he identified with that historical character.
- 5. Especially vol. 7, part 1, The Hellenistic World, ed. F. W. Walbank; A. E. Astin, et al. (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1984).
- 6. There were thirteen rulers (a few of which, like Smerdis [522], Xerxes III [424], Sogianos [424–423], ruled only a very short time) of Persia in all; cf. E. M. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990) for a helpful survey of the period.
- 7. Miller, Daniel, 291.
- 8. See S. Mandell and J. Hayes, A History of the Jews From the Hellenistic Through the Early Roman Eras (333 BCE–135 CE) (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox, 1998), 30.
- See S. R. Driver, The Book of Daniel (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1900), 170, and J. S. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1927), 437, plus discussion in Collins, Daniel, 379.
- 10. H. Heinen, "The Syrian-Egyptian Wars and the New Kingdoms of Asia Minor," The Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 7, part 1, 436–39.
- 11. Collins, Daniel, 380.
- 12. Ibid., 382.
- 13. Miller, Daniel, 298–99, following Calvin.
- 14. So Goldingay, Daniel, 299-300.
- 15. See Mandell and Hayes, A History of the Jews, 51-54.
- 16. Ibid., 58.
- 17. Ibid., 65, though Mandell and Hayes think this may be an "ideological fiction," since it was not mentioned in 2 Maccabees.
- 18. R. J. Clifford, "History and Myth in Daniel 10-12," BASOR 220 (1975): 23-26.
- 19. Most notably, Goldingay, Daniel; D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon (Tübingen: J. C. Mohr, 1986).
- 20. See here T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography.
- 21. Baldwin, Daniel, 198-201.
- 22. A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979).
- 23. This word is used for the first time in the letters of John (see 1 John 2:18).
- 24. See also Ezek. 28:1–19. This arrogance is anticipated in the horn that speaks arrogant words against God (Dan. 7:8, 11, 25; 8:9–12).
- 25. J. Lindenberger, "Daniel 12:1-4," Interp 39 (1985): 182.
- 26. G. W. E. Nickelsburg Jr., Resurrection, Immortality, and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1972), 11.

- 27. Towner, Daniel, 166. This view is widely held, though Goldingay (Daniel, 308) doubts it, asserting that it has a "thisworldly connotation."
- 28. Miller, Daniel, 320.
- 29. Collins, Daniel, 399.
- 30. Baldwin, Daniel, 208, adds the intriguing observation that it would be historically incorrect to say that Antiochus broke the power of the people of God (12:7). This suggests to her that something more than the second century B.C. is hinted at here.
- 31. Other scholars, who adopt a second-century B.C. date for this section of Daniel, suggest that the reference is exclusively to the period of Antiochus and that we are dealing with failed prophetic expectation. They point out that since the Maccabees actually cleansed the temple within three years, even the shorter three-and-a-half-year date, meant that the "Danielic" party had something else in mind for fulfillment, perhaps the resurrection of the martyrs. When that did not happen after three and a half years, they suggested 1290 days. Then when that failed to be the period for fulfillment, they tacked on a few more days to get the 1335 days. This is ingenious given their presupposition and the fact that this is often how modern apocalyptic speculation works; but how likely is it that a written text would be updated in such a short time? Mention should also be made of the fact that there were a number of different calendars in use during the second century B.C.—a solar calendar, a lunar calendar and a luni-solar calendar (for details, see Goldingay, Daniel, 309–10). Such an observation does not clarify things as much as complicates them, that is, makes the references even more enigmatic to us and most likely to the original audience.
- 32. Goldingay, Daniel, 314–16.
- 33. Towner, Daniel, 175.
- 34. For Ecclesiastes, see T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998).
- 35. See the treatment of this psalm on pp. 124–26.
- 36. Cf. T. Longman III and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior; see discussion above on pp. 254–56.
- 37. Towner, Daniel, 148.
- 38. Goldingay, Daniel, 316.
- 39. Ibid., 319.
- 40. See R. van Leeuwen, "Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs," Hebrew Studies 33 (1992): 25–36, who isolates a small number of proverbs in the book that recognize the complicated nature of retribution.
- 41. For how this passage and the overall teaching of the Teacher fits into the book of Ecclesiastes and the theology of the canon, please see the introduction in Longman, Ecclesiastes.
- 42. As Collins argues in his helpful excursus "On Resurrection," Daniel, 394–98.
- 43. For an interpretation of this passage and for an explanation how such a bleak view fits into the message of the Bible as a whole, see Longman, Ecclesiastes, in loc.
- 44. J. Wilson, Gospel Virtues (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1998) provides an excellent description of these two worldviews.
- 45. F. Nietzsche, "On Truth and Lie in the Extra-Moral Sense," in Walter Kaufmann, ed., The Portable Nietzsche (New York: Viking, 1968), 46.
- 46. A. C. Thiselton, Interpreting God and the Postmodern Self (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 5.